Then the second legion was put forth, and in the midst entred things, even to a that time, the rippants oare a name only in the battell, without any use and service at all. That violence of the Elephants (incl. as it was) the Latine allies seconded immediate I ly and sorced the left shuk to retire. Then the second legion was put forth, and in the midd entred upon the Phalanx and put it to flight; neither was there any saile of victory more evident than this hamely, that many skirmshes there were industed places and the failt troubled the Phalanx, and ascerwards allcomfitted it. True it is shart to abide the force there it is uppossible, along as it keepen close timited together, as put exhibitors their sharppointed places beat thick couched together breft high; but it a man by chaffing the faile fame here and there, force them one togram about those places, which for their length and beavy weight are unwisely and than to guide story food are intended and catch one within another uncowardy; but in case it fallows considering one of any chault made either aflant or behind, then there employ in a guide in the local condition of all, as it they all at once came simbling down; like as at happed them, when as assault the form mans, who affilled them by troops in bundry parts, they were driven to break them therein made and are left between, and there they would midma assault the form many precessars it were and to comake head & affront the cerum, surface, it comass gipted, where their rapids and their traphs and these who, if they had removed the flow of the Plantax Coperator and the proposed of the conflict hardween, and there they would midma and wind in with their raphs and these who, if they had removed the flow of the Plantax Coperator allogether with their sales and the surface of the conflict hardween, and there have would midma and wind in with their whole battaillon, they had removed to the conflict hardween the flow of the Plantax Coperator and the proposed of the conflict hardween the flow of the Plantax Coperator and the proposed of the conflict hardween the coperat

A were there flain, and to the number of 6000 (who, fled to Pydna out of the battail) came alive inweightere hands a 1900 heider wege saken pritoners, as they fied fortering and distanded bere and sheet. Of the victors, thereologist above an hundred, and the more parthylise of Pellignians; but a greater number fomew hat were but and wounded. And the more parthylise of Pellignians; but a greater number fomew hat were burt and wounded. And the more batteril had begin fooner, that the winners might have had day enough to follow the chair upon their enemies, all their forces had been unterly defeated and deavoured by the fword : but now the night coming upon them, as it covered and shadowed the enemies that fled, so it caused the Romans not to be To hafty and forward in pursuit; confidering they were not acquainted with the coafts of the countrey. Perfort fled to the forrest Pieria by the port rode way, with a great number of horimer and his royal train about him. So foon as he was entred the forest where the way divided into R fundry and divers parts, seeing that the night approached, he turned out of the high beaten way with very few of his most loyal and faithful friends. The horsemen being thus abandoned and lest deflitute of their leader, flipt some one way and some another home into their own Cities; cerrain of them (but very few) recovered Pella before Perfeus himself, because they rode a direct and ready way. The K, was much troubled and vexed until midnight almost, what with fear and what with difficulty to find out the way. When he was come to Pella, Entlus the Governour thereof. and the Kings pages, were ready attendant at the court to wait upon him and do him fervice : but contrary-wife, of all those friends who escaped safe out of the battail and chanced by variable adventures to come into Pella, there would not one come at him not with flanding they were often times fent for. Three only bare him company in that flight of his, to wit, Evander of Crete, Neon C a Boxotian, and Archidamus the Exolian. Fearing therefore left they who refused to come unrehim, would foon after enterprise some greater matter against him ; with those three befled still forward, about the fourth watch of the night. After him therefollowed upon 500 Cretenfians Toward Amphipolis he went; but he departed in the night from Pella, making all the half he could to pass over the river Axim before day-light, supposing that the Romans would give over the chafe there, by reason of the difficult and dangerous foord.

The Gonful being returned into the camp with victory, (because he should not have the fruition on of sincere and perfect joy) was greatly disquired, and troubled about his yonger son, and that was P. Scipio, surnamed also afterwards Africanus, because he raised the City of Carthage: the statused son he was of the Consul Paulus, and the adopted nephew or grand-child of Africanus: he D was at that time 17 years of age, and (which sugmerted the sorrow of the father) while she foljolowed in the father while she fa the jety of so great a victory, and not before.

When the bruit and news of this battail was arrived at Amphipola, and that the dames and wives of the City ran flocking into the Temple of Diana, whom they call Tauropolos, to be and call for her aid, Diodoras the chief Governor of the City, fearing the Thracians (who were 2009 in garrioo) led in that tunnals and garboil they would fooil and rifle the City; craftily softor—and a laddor on her purpose in guilf and shew of a letter-carrier, and received from him letters in the midsof the market place; wherein it was written, That the Roman sleet was arrived in the Brain and that the territories all about were pitifully wasted by them; and therfore the fulers and capesins of Emminis requested him to send a garison to succour them against these foragers. When he had sead chefe counterfair letters, he exhorted the Thracians to undertake this expedition and to go sink Emminis from 50 gatacthe coasts there is giving them to undertand, that considering the Romans were loosly stragging and instructed shows the fields and villages, they might make a fout has sock and staughter of it tem and before raise and being away with stem agreat booty with all, be singus nor so elevate assume as the could, the same of the forsial ashappy field fought, saying. This sital had been enter, there would have been mellengers coming thick one after a mother upon their flight, to bring fresh tidings still she for. Under this pretence he sent away the Thracians is said to soon as he swettey were passed over the tiver Strymon, incontinently he shur the general Theshird day after the bartal sought came Perseut to Amphypsis, and from tence the sent of Penseus with an herald of peace, Mean-while Hippius, Midan, and Pantaccu, the Kings principal strends, went themselves to the Consul, and surrendred unto the Romans Berrhasi which they had retired and fied immediately our of the field. Other Cities also strucken with fear one after another, prepared to do the like.

The Conful, after he haddent to Rose with a fellings and letters of this victory. Q. Fabius his own fon together with L. Lenselus and Q. Metellus, gave the spoil of the enemies army thus lying defeated, supporting the content by above detailing the servicery round about with conditions, that they should not be ablest from the camp more than two nights. Then he removed never unto the feet and lodged shoote Pada, his R. Exp. Sec. (as is before and by seeled, then the standard of the standard Pellas and consequently, all Macedony well-neer within two dates was surrended.

The flatming and Pells and confequently all Macdony well-neer within two dates was furrendeed. But the Pydneans who, were next unto him, as yet were behind with fending their Embassadors: the reason was, for that the confueled confluence thinker of many nations; and the dilordered multitude of those that flee out of the field, and were all met there together, hindred the counsel and confern of the whole they to as the gards were not only that but also mured up. Now were Mine and Palsanian fleet of part under the walls with Solon, who laythere with a garrison by who demants the whole troop and multitude of armed men was feet away, the City rendred up and the pellage given to the fouldiers.

Parison whose only hope was in the aid of the Bila res whom he had affaied and follitized; and it Paysa, whose only nope was in the and or one now reword and considered and lost titled, and for which purpose he had fent his Embafadors (although fill-wish) field a publick affembly; and bringing his fon Philip with him, came forth before the people is one cand that he might by some exhortation confirm and frengthen the hearts, as well of the Amphipolitians as the companies of foot and horse, who either at all times continually had followed him, of were retired thither by flight for refuge. But ever as he was about to make a peech unto the audience (which he oft began to do) he could not proceed for tears. Now for that himself was not able to speak, he came down from the pulpit and imparted unto Evander the Cretenfian those points, which his will was to be delivered and proposed unto the congregation there affembled. The multitude, as they lamented and wept again to fee the King fo pitcoufly fied tearsilo they regarded not the speech of Evandere nay, some of them were to bold as to cry out aloud from the midst of the assembly, A-I way, away, and get ye gone from hence that the final remnant of us here perish not for your lakes. The front resolution of these men stopped Evanderhis mouth, that he could not say a word and reply again. The King by this time was gotten to his lodging, and having conveighed into certain bottoms upon the river Strymon all his money, gold, and filver, went also in person down to the water fide. The Thracians durst not go aboord and commit to sea, but slunk every man away to his own home; and so did all the fort of fouldiers besides. The Cretensians only for greedy hope of gain) accompanied the King, who because in sharing & dealing money among them he should incur more offence than win thanks laid out fifty talents among them upon the river fide to feamble for. When they had made quick riddance and a clean hand with it they went aboord in a great hurry fo as one barge overcharged with a multitude of passengers was cast away and tunk in the K mouth of the river. That very day they arrived at Galipfus, and the morrow after at Samothrace, the very place that they intended ; and thither (by report) were converghed 2000 talents. Pag-Lus after he had fent prefidents to govern every City furrendred, to the end that no injury should be offered in this new peace to the conquered, and detaining with him fill the Kings heralds and Orators, not knowing any thing of the Kings flight and departure, fent P. Nasica to Amphipolis with a mean regiment of foot and horse, to ruinat and destroy at once Sinica, and also to empeach all the designments and enterprises of the Romans.

In this time Melibaa was forced and ranlacked by Cn. Offavius a but at Aginium (to the nege whereof Cn. Anicius the Lieutenant was fent) 200 men were loft by a fally made out of the town, for that the Æginians heard not the news of the late defeat, 1

The Conful departed from Pydna with his whole army, and the morrow after came before Pella, Where having encamped within a mile of the City, he made abode there for certain daies to view on all fides the fituation of the City, which he perceived and marked full well, to have been thosen not without good cause, for the imperial sear of the Macedonian Kings. Situat it is upon an hill that lieth to the Southwest enclosed found with means so deep as they cannot possibly be waded and passed though : and these marishes are bred and sed both winter and summer by waters overflowing out of certain lakes. Within the very marish next unto the City side, there standeth a strong Tower by it self, bearing up above the rest, as it were an Island raised upon a terrace made with exceeding labor of mans hand, which terrace both fullaineth a wall, and is not hurt with the moissure of the marish round about it; and a far off seemeth close joined to the City wall, Howbeit, divided it is by a river between it and the wall, and yet united to the City by a bridg over it? fo as, who foever affaileth the fame without, can have no access any way to it neither, if the King be disposed to shut and enclose any man within, can he possibly make an estape and get forth but over the faid bridg: which a few men may keep and guard with eafe. In this place the Kingo treafuse aled to lie, but at that time there was no more found but the 300 talents which were lent to King Gentius first, and afterward said and detained. During the time that the Confol remained about Pella in his standing camp many embassages had anothence given them, who repaired shither out of Theffaly especially to congratulate with him; teftifying their own joy and wishing his; But the Conful after that he had intelligence that Perfeus had Croffed over to Samothracia, departed from Pella, and at the fourth gift and journey that he made; came to Amphipolis. The whole mule 1 sirude went forth of the City in great numbers to meet him, which gave tellimony to every mast, that neither a good nor just King

DErleus was taken prisoner by Emylius Paulus in Samothracia When Antiochus Keng of Syria befieged Ptolomans and Cleopatra, King and Queen of Egypt, Embal adors were fent from the Senat of Rome, willing Antiochus to give over, and besiege no more an affociat King unto them : bat

when he made answer to this their message delivered, that he would cohsidir hetter what he had to do, Popilius one of the said Embassacionish his red that he had in his hand drew a circle about the King, and charged him to give him another answer before he went out of that circle; by which rude; rough, and blant behavior, he forced Antiochus to lay away arms and furcease war. Divers Embassics of States and Kings came with congratulation, and were admitted into the Senat. As for that of the Rhodians becausesn the late war they food out and took part against the Romans, it was excluded. The morrow after when it was debated in counsel, about making war upon the Rhodians the Embassadors pleaded the cause of their countrey in the Senat: So, they neither had a friendly dispatch and farewel, as allied associates nor Jet were fest away as professed enemies. Macedony was now reduced into the form of a Province Emy-lius Paulus criumphed, notwithst anding the contradition of his own souldiers, discontented for that they B were pinched & cut fhort in the pillage, & although Set, Sulpitius Galba interposed himself & gainfaid it. Heled before his chariot Perseus with his three sons. And that the joy of this triumph of his should not beentire and accomplished, lemished fouly it was with the death of his two fons: the one died before the other after the triumph of the father. The Cenfors took a review of the City, in which were affelfed and enrolled in their subfidy books 31 2805 citizens. Prusas King of Bithynia repaired to Rome, to rejoyce with the Senat in their behalf for the victory and conquest of Macedony, where her commended unto the Senat his fon Nicomedes. This base minded King, made all of flattery named himself the enfranchised vasfal of the people of Rome.

Uintius Fabius, L. Lentulus, and Q. Metellus, the messengers of the late victory, albeit the made all the hast that possibly they could, and came speedily to Rome, yet found the jou therof to have prevented them: for the fourth day after the battail fought with the King even as the playes and games were exhibited in the shew-place, there was heard suddainly at first, a confused humming noise, which spred over all the companies of the spectators, That a field was fought in Macedony and Perfeus vanquished: afterwards arose a more cleer and evident voice, which grew at length to an open shout and clapping of hands, as if certain news had been brought of the said victory. The magistrats wondred hereat, and madesearch after the author of D this fo fuddain gladness, but none would be found : and then verily it passed away as the momentany joy of some vain and uncertain occurrence: howbeit a joyful presage of some good luck setled in mens hearts and remained behind. But after that this was confirmed by the true report and relation of Fabius, Lentulus, and Metellus, which they made at their coming all men rejoyced as well at the fore-giving of their minds, as for the victory it felf. This joyous conceit of this affembly in the thew-place, is reported otherwise, and carrieth with it no less probability and likelihood of truth, in this manner: Upon the # 22 of September (which was the second day of the fo- * ad divinuity Temnity of Romans games) as the Conful was going up to the lifts for to let out the running of calendar Office the chariots, a post, by report, (who said he was come out of Macedony) presented letters unto him bino decked with lawrel. The Conful then fo foon as he had fer on foot the race, prefently mounted up E into his own chariot : and as he rode through the shew-place toward the common scaffolds, he thewed unto the people the faid laureat letters which being once feen, the people prefently (forgerting all their sports and sights) ran out into the mids of the cirque & thither the Cof affembled The Senat sunto whom when he had read the letters, by the advice and allowance of the LL. even before the publick stages and scaffolds, he published the contents thereof to all the people in this manner, That L. Emplius his colleague had fought a fet field with K. Perfeus, That the army of the Macedonians was discomfitted and put to flight, That the King himlelf was fled with some few of listrain, and that all the Cities of Macedony were subdued and brought under the subjection of the people of Rome. These tidings were no fooner heard, but there arose a shout with exceeding great applaule, in fo much as many men there, left the fight of these disports, and carried these joy-Thil news home to their wives and children. This was the thirteenth day after the battail given in Macedony. The morrow after the Senat affembled in Curia (Hoffilia) and ordained it was that publick processions should be solemnized an Act also passed, that the Consul Emplianshould dismiss all those that had taken the military oath, excepting only the sea-souldiers and mariners and as for the discharging of those founders, agreed it was that it should be moved in the Councel-chamber, When the Lieuxenants were artived and come from L. Himpling the Conful for they had dispatched a courtier with letters before them, Now these messengers afordiaid entred the City the * 25th of all seen be September about the fecond hour of the day, and drew after them a mighty train of those who en- lend, officer as countring them upon the way whereforer they went, accompanied them to Rome and so directly Went to the market-place and tribunal fear. In fortuned that the Senators far then in the ordinary Caria or Councel-houle, and this her the Conful brought the Emballadors. The state of the large of that the fleet was intradines to make may after them in thate; and that it was not possible for time of cape either by Land of

they made relation of the same. And then the joy was renewed upon proclamation made by the H Conful, That all the facred temples and churches should be set open; and that every man should depart out of the assembly to render thanks unto the Godsin such fort, that all the temples of the Gods throughout the whole City were replenished with mighty multitudes and congregations not of men only, but also of women. Then the Senat met again in the ordinary Curia: and ordatned that publick processions and thanks should be made for five daies together in all Churches and Chappels and at every Altar for the happy and fortunar success of L. Emylius, and that greater head of beafts should be killed for facrifice, Alfo that the ships which rid ready rigged and well appointed in the river Tyberis for to be fent into Macedonys in case it had so faln out, that the King had been able to have refifted) should be retired and drawn to land, and so laid up drie in their do. ks and arfenals: also that the mariners should be cassed, after the receit of a whole years pay, I and together with all those who had sworn to serve the Consul should have their conge and pa-Sport to be gone, Item, that all the souldiers in Coreyra, Brundusium, about the Adriatick sea, or in the territory of the Larinats (for in all these there was an army set in readiness, wher with C. Licinius if need required should have succoured his colleague) should have their discharge. Also processions were published in the full assembly of the people, to begin * from the tenth day of Offeber, and fo to hold on five daies after. brought word that the army of the Illyrians was defeated that King Gentius was taken prisoner.& that all Illyricum was reduced under the obeitance of the people of Rome, For which exploits atchieved by the leading and conduct of L. Some have recorded that the Rhodian Embaffadors had not yet their dilpatch, nor were lent away, but after the news of this victory, were called into the Senat in mockery and foorn of that fortish insolence and pride of their own. And then Agepolis the principal person of them spake in this manner, "That the Rho-"dians had fent them in deed as Embassadors to treat about an accord & to make peace between the Romans and King Perfeut, for that this war as it was grievous and prejudicial to all Greece, " fo it could not chuse but be chargeable and hurtful to the Romans themselves. But saln out it is " passing well through the goodness of fortune, that the war is ended otherwise : and hath given them fo good an occasion and opportunity, to rejoyce and testify their joy in the behalf of the L Romans for the atchievance of fo brave and notable a victory. Thus much spake the Rhodian. And then the Senat made answer again, "That the Rhodians had sent that embassy not regarding the good and profit of Greece, nor yet for any care they had of the expenses defraied by the Ro-"mans but only in love and favor of King Perfeus. For if they had been respective unto them (as "they would make semblance and have the world to think) they should have addressed their Em-66 bassadors when as Persens invaded The saly with an army, & for two years space persecuted and " plagued the cities of Greece, belieging fome, & frighting others with menaces of warryet all that "while, not a word with the Rhodians as touching peace. But after that they heard once that the "Romans were mounted over the Breights and passed through into Macedon; that King Perseus "was there up and enclosed fore enough for flarting any way, then and not before, they could lend M an embaffige for no other reason in the world but to rid and deliver Perfeus out of that imminent "danger which threatned him so neer hand. With which answer the Embass, were fent away. About the very same time M. Marcellus being departed out of his government in the province of Spain, after he had forced and won Marcolica a renowned and famous City in those parts, bout a million of Sefferces in filver coin. Paulus Émplius the Conful lying encamped (as is aforefaid) neer Syra in the Odomantidian terricory, when he saw the letters from King Perfeus brought unto him by three Embaliadors of base condition, wept (by report) himfelf, to confider the frailty of this world, and the fickle fite of mans life; to fee (I fay) that he who erewhile could not rest content with the rotalty of Macedony, N but would needs war upon the Dardanians and Illyrians and levy the aid of the Baffarnians, was now after the loss of his army, as one exiled out of his own Kingdom, driven into a small lland, where, like a poor suppliant he remained in surety, not by means of his own forces, but through the religious prorection of a lanctuary & priviledged place. But when he read the superscription of the letter with this stile. King Persens to the Conful Paulus, greeting, he could no more pity him for thinking of his blockish folly, in that he had no sence and seeling of the calamity and milery wherin he flood. And therfore albeit the contents of the letter otherwise were praires so demis and abject as little favoured of aprincely mind, yet was that embassage dismilled without answer and without letters. Perfem foon perceived what title it was that he must lay down and forget now that he was vanquished: wherupon he addressed other letters, in quality of a privat person with-O out any other addition at all: and by those as he craved so obtained he likewise, that certain agents should be fent unto him, with whom he might parley and commune as touching the flate and condition of his present fortune. So three delegat Embassadess were sent unto him, namely. P. Lentulus, A. Posthumius Albinus and A. Antonius, But nothing was effected in this agency or Embaffage; whiles Perfeu fluck hard and laboured all he could to hold fill and keep the rotal name of King, and Parlus endeavoured contrary-wife, that he should submit himself and all that he had brought home with him and beflowed in the publick treasury ten pound weight of gold, and a-

A to the protection and elemency of the people of Rome. During these debates and affaires between them, the fleet of Cn. Oftwoiss was arrived at Samothrace, who also presenting before their eyes featfull objects of terror, went about to force him as well by threats and menaces, as to win him by hope of fair intreaty and good ulage to yeeld and submit; and herein he found some help by means of an occurrent, either happing by chance and meer adventure, or contrived by mans device of fet purpole, L. Attilius a noble yong Gentleman, perceiving that the people of the Samothracians were met in a general affembly, requested of the Magistrats that he might be permitted to make a short speech unto the people. Good leave he had, and then he began in this wife; "My "masters and friends of Samothracia, I would gladly know, whether it be a falle fable or a true tale which we have heard, That this is a facred lland, and the foil therof holy and altogether inviol-B "able? When they all accorded in one confent, that the Iland was as holy and facred as it was re-"ported: How is it then (qd, he) that a murtherer hath violated and polluted it with the blood " of King Eumenes? And confidering that in all preambles and prefaces of facred and divine service "premiled, they are commanded precisely to avant from the ministery thereof, who have not pure "and innocent hands; will you fuffer in deed your most secret sanctuaries and devout tabernacles " to be stained with the bloody body of a thief and fellon? Now was it a rife report and common bruit in every City of Greece, That K. Eumenes had like to have been murdred at Delphos by Evander. The Samothracians, besides that they saw their whole I land and the said Temple to be in the power and puilfance of the Romans, took these reproofs and reproaches to touch them neer, and not without just cause: whereupon they sent Theondas, the soveraign magistrate (whom they call Ctheir K. Junto King Perfeus, giving him to understand, "That Evander the Cretenfian was charged "with murder: also that by custom and tradition from their ancestors, they had full power and "authority to proceed by order of law, against all those that were presented and endited for en-"tring within the liberties and facred precincts of the Temple, with unclean and unpure hands. « Now if Evander stand upon his innocency and knoweth himself cleer and unguity of the capital "crime laid to his charge, let him come to his answer and plead his cause for his own defence, and "he shall be heard: but if he dare not hazard the judicial tryal of the issue, retire he and depart, "that he pollute not the temple; let him shift for himself and escape away. Perfens called forth Evander unto him, willing him in no case to trythe process of justices for neither would his cause justify him, nor any favour bear him out. He much feared withal, left being cast and condemned, the would bewray Perfeus himself and appeach him for the setter and author of that so horrible a fact a and no way then but one even with patience and resolution to take his death, Evander gainfaid nought in outward appearance, but pretending in words, that he had rather dye by a cup of poison than upon the swords point, sought secret means to slie and be gone. The King upon advertilement hereof, fearing left the Samothracians would discharge their anger upon him, as if he had wrought his evasion to avoid due punishment, commanded Evander to be made away and killed After which murder committed thus rashly without a advisement, he be thought himself & considered, that he should be touched deeply with the same spot of guilt that Evander was noted with: namely, that as Eumenes was by Evander wounded at Delphos, to Evander by him was murdered in Samothracia; and so the two most holy and religious temples in the world were stained t and polluted with mans blood; and who but he the cause and contriver thereof? But the blame of this foul fact of his, was by the corruption of Theondas quite averted another way; and he for a fum of money bare the people in hand, that Evander was his own hangman. But Perfeus by this lewd and derestable act, committed upon the person of the only friend whom he had alive, fo well approved and tried by him in so many adventures, and now betraied for his labour by him, unto whom he refused to be a traitor) estranged clean the hearts and affections of all men from him: fo as now every man ranged with the Romans. Thus abandoned as he was and left to himfelf, they forced him to cast about and devise how to escape and be gone. Whereupon he called unto him Oroandes the Cretenfian, a man that knew well the coasts of Thrace, because he had negotiated and traded in those parts; Jand with him he dealt to embask him in some small soils; and p fo to conduct him into Coty. Now there was a certain bay under a promontory of Thrace, wherein a pinnace flood in readiness: thither, after fun-letting were all things brought for necessary bles and money withal, almuch as closely cold be conveighed. The King himself at midnight accompanied with three persons (for no more were privy to this his flight) went out at a postern or back dore of the houle, into a garden neer his bed-chamber, and to with much ado having clambred over a mud wall, passed to the water side. Now was Oroandes already loosed from the foresaid creek, for fo food as the money was once brought thither into the veffel, he lanched into the deep and fet his course for Candy. Perfeus, after that the bark was not to be found in the bay, walked and wandred a good while along the strand: and searing at last the day-light approaching (yet not so hardy as to adventure back again to his lodging) lurked behind in one fide of the temple close G unto a blind corner and nook thereof. Among the Macedonians, they called those the Kings pages who were the Princes and noble mens fons, chosen to serve and wait upon the person of the King, That company yet followed after the K, in his flight, and as hard as the world went, departed not from him until such time as by the commandment of Cn. Octavilis, the publick cryer pronounced with a loud woice, That the Rings pages and all other Macedonians befides in Samothracia, if they would turn to the Romans, (hould enjoy with fafety of life their estate entire, their liberty, free, and all that ever they either had about them, or was left in Macedony. At which proclamation

once published, they all immediatly revolted to the Romans, and entred their names with C. P. diene humins, a martial colonel. Likewile lon of The falonica, delivered into the hands of Off avine the wong infants of the King, and not one of them all was left with Perfeus, but Philip his elder fon: and then he veelded both himself and that ion into the hands of Ottavius, crying out upon fortune, and blaming the Gods in whole Temple they were, for that he received no aid and fuccour from them, notwithstanding he humbly craved and besought the same. Then commandment was given, that he should be embarked in the admirals ship: and thither also was brought abourd all the money that remained, and then forthwith the fleet retired to Amphipolis : from whence Colawissent the King to the camp unto the conful, but first he had dispatched his letters to give him knowledge, that he was fure enough under his hand, and that he was at the point to be brought unto him. Panins, reputing this for a fecond victory, (as it was no less indeed to be effected) presently upon the receit of the message, killed beatts for sacrifice : and when he had called his councel about him, and read the letters of the Pretor beforethem, he fent Q. Elius Tubero to meet the K, upon the way, and commanded the rest in good frequency to remain in his capital pavillion, and give attendance upon him. Never was there feen before, fo great a multitude to onn out for to fee any solemn fight or pageant. In their fathers daies King Syphax was taken prisoner and brought into the Roman camp; who befides that there was no comparison between him and Perfeus, either in regard of his ownname or the renown of his nation, was then also but an acceffary as it were to the Punick war, like as Gentius now to the Macedonian. Per feus was the very head of this war, neither was it the fame of his father and grandfire only (whom he neerly to uched in birth and blood) that made him renowned, but the resplendent giory of Philip and Alexan-K der the Greet, who brought the foversign empire and monarchy of the whole world to the Mace-donian nation. Well, Perseus entred the camp arrayed in a black cloak, without any one of his own train to accompany him, who partaking his milery, might cause more compassion to behad of him. The affluence of the people was so great who went out to see him, that for the very prese he could not march forward, untill such time as the conful sent his sergeauts and hu ishers to void the thronging of the multitude, and make way for him to go to the conful his pavillion. The conful arose, and (giving commandment to the rest for to sit still) advanced forward a little, and raught out his hand to the King as he entred into the pavillion; and when he bowed and debased himself to his very feet, he took him up again and would not suffer him once to touch his knees, but led him into the tent and caused him to fit down right over-against those whom he called thither to councel. The first question that he demanded of him was this; "What wrong he had" " fustained at the hands of the people of Rome, that he should be constrained to enterprise and be-"gin the war against them with so malicious a mind as he did, and so to hazard himself his whole "Hate and Kingdom, in such extremity of danger? And when every man attended what answer he would make, he staied a good while without utterance of one word, casting his eyes wistly upon the ground, and shedding tears withal, "Then spake the consul again: If you had been but " yong (qd, he) when you came to the crown, I would verily for my part marvail the lefs, that you " should be so ignorant as not to know how important it was, to have the people of Rome either se for a friend or an enemy : bue now, fince you both had your hand in that war which your father " waged against us, and also could not chuse but remember the peace afterwards made with him M "and which we observed most faithfully, What policy was it for you to entertain war rather et than peace, with them, whose force you had tried in war and whose fidelity you had sound in peace? Whenas he would yet make no answer at all either to question or acculation, the conful went on and faid: "Well, howfoever these things are thus faln out and come to pass, be it through "the error and frailty of man by adventure of fortune and hard hap, or fatal necessity of the desti-"nies, be of good chear yet, and take a mans heart unto you; the gracious clemency and mercy of ct the people of Rome, well known and proved in the missoriunes of many Princes and States, af-"foord unto you not only hope, but certain affurance of fafety. Thus much spake he to Perfeus in the Greek tongue: then, turning to his own affiftants and company about him, he directed his speech to them in Latine as followeth. "A notable example and rare mitrour you see (qd. he) of N et the changeable variety of this world: to you I speak especially, my masters here that are stell "and youthful gallants in the heat of your yong blood. And therefore let no man in time of his " prosperity, carry himself proud and violent against another, nor yet considently to trust upon "the present stare wherein he is, for who knoweth what may hap once yet before midnight? But "him alone will I hold for a man of valour indeed, whose heart neither the gentlegale of this fawning and flattering world is able to lift aloft nor yet the bluftering blafts of frowning forune " cast down or dash upon the rocks. After the conful was rifen and departed, he committed the charge and custody of keeping the King to Quintus Elius, But forthat day Persons was not only invited courteoufly to sup with the conful, but respected also in all kind of honor, as possibly might be done unto him in that state and condition of his.

After this the army was divided here and there into garrifons for the wipter time. The greatest part thereof was received into Amphipolu, and the other cities neer adjoining entertained the rest. This was the end of the war between Perfeus and the Romans, which had endured four years one after another continually: and here an end withal of the most flourishing Kingdom of the greatest part of Europe and of all Asia. Perfers was counted the twentieth King after Caranas, who was the first that raigned there. This Perfeus began his raign that year wherein Q. Fuloius

A and L. Manlius were Confuls. In the time of M. Junius and A. Manlius Confuls of Rome, the Se. nat entituled and honoured him with the name of King, and eleven years his raign continued. The name of these Macedonians was very obscure and base, untill the daies of Philip the son of Amymia. From that time and by his means it began to grow and waz great: howbeit, contained it was within the compais and precincts of Europe, comprehending all Greeks, and part of Thrace and Illyricum. Afterwards it spread into Asia, and in thirteen years space, during the raign of Al lexander, it subdued and brought under subjection, first all those parts whereunto the empire of the Persians extended, which was an infinit dominion in circuit: afterwards it reached to Arabia and India, even to the end of the earth, bounding and confining all about upon the red fea. At that B time was the monarchy and name of the Macedoniansthe greatest in the whole world but upon the death of Alexander, distracted it was and divided into many and fundry Kingdoms, And whiles each one endeavoured & strove by force to draw unto him more and more pullance, they difmembred and rent the whole: & fo from the highest top & pitch of prosperity, brought it down to a most base and low condition, after it had continued in good estate a hundred and fifty years. When the bruit of the Romans victory was blazed and blown as far as to Alia, Antenor who with a fleet of barks and pinnaces rid in the harbour of Phane, failed from thence to Caffandred. C. Popilius, who was in Delos to guard and wast those ships which were bound for Macedony, after he heard fay that the war in Macedony was brought to an end, and the enemies veffels removed out of their rode, dismissed also for his part the Athenian ships, intending to go forward in his voiage efor Laype, to accomplish that embassage which he had taken in hand; to the end that he might encounter Antiochus, before he approached the walls of Alexandria, As these Embassadors coasted along the river of Asia, and were arrived at Laryma (a port somewhat more than twenty miles distant from Rhodes, and fituat just over against the city) the principal States of Rhodes, met him in the way (for now by this time was the fame of this victory flown fofar) requesting him to set fail thither and there to land: for that it concerned their city much in fame and reputation, yea, and was expedient for their good and safety, that they should be made acquainted with all that either had been done or was now in hand at Rhodes, and so to make report thereof at Rome upon their own knowledge, and not as things were voiced by the common bruit. They refused a long time, but in the end they were so importuned, that content they were to fail a little farther, and spend Diome imall time for to gratify and benefit a city affociat unto them. When they were come to Rhodes, the same principal citizens aforesaid urged them instantly with much prayer and entreaty to come into their general affembly of the people. The arrival of those Embassadors rather augmented than empaired the fear of the city. For Popilins made rehearfal there in open audience, of all which had been done or fooken (founding any way to hostility) either in particular or in general by them, during the late wat. And being as he was,a grim fir, tough and flerce by nature, he aggravated all that he spake, with his sour visage and sharp language, like an accuser at the bar : insomich as they might well conjecture and guesse, how the whole body of the Senate stood affected unto them, by the butternels of one only Senator, who otherwise for himself had no occasion of patticular ill will and malice against the city. But the speech of Decimius was more temperat, who said, Ethat the blame of those imputations for the most part which were objected by Popilius, was not to be laid upon the people, but upon a few persons, who had sollicited and stirred the multitude: for those having their tongue at hire, and using to speak for gain, had made decrees full of flattery to please the King, and sent such embassages, as the Rhodians at all times were no less ashamed than repented of. All which practifes of theirs no doubt would fall upon their heads who were faulty. in case the people had the government and rule in their own hands. Audience he had with great affent and applante; not more for elevating the fault and trespais of the common people, that for laying the weight upon those that were the authors culpable. And therefore when the chief men among them made answer to the Romans, their words, who went about to excuse and salve in fome fort as well as they could the articles objected by Popilius, were not so well taken, as their peech who accorded to Desimius, in delivering the guilty persons and offenders to be punished according to their demerits. Wherupon there passed presently a decree, That all those who might be convicted of any deed done or word spoken in favour of Perseus against the Romans, should be condemned and have sentence to lose their heads. Some of these persons were departed out of the city upon the coming of the Romans, others laid violent hands upon themselves. These Embassa dors or delegats having fojourned no longer than five daies at Rhodes, departed and made fail for Alexandria. And notwithstanding their absence, the execution of judicial proceeding was no less hotly followed at Rhodes, according to the decree made in their presence, For the moderation and gentle carriage of Decimius was the very capile that they perfifted relolute, and gave not over untill they had gone through with it, and dispatched all.

Whiles the affairs were thus managed, Antiochurafter he had affaired invain to force the walls

Whiles the affairs were thus managed, Antiochurafter he had affaired invain to force the walls of Alexandria, was departed from before the city, & having possessed himself of all Agypt besides, and left the elder Prolomans at Memphia, (for whole behoot he pretended by his own forces to reconques the Kingdom, to the end that food after the conquest obtained, he might fer upon him likewife) withdrew his army away into Spria. Peolomans for his part was nothing ignorant of his designment and intention, making full account, that whileshe kept his yought brother affrighted with the less of sege, by the help of his fifter he might be received into Alexandriat Confidering, with all that his brothers friends were not opposed against him, first he fest subto his fifted.

afterwards to his brother and his friends, and never gave over to write and fend, before he had to concluded and established a peace with them. The thing that made him to suspect Antischin was this for that when he had made over all the reft of * Agypt unto him he left yet a ftrong garifon behind at Pelufum: and well he knew, that he held ftill the frontier Towns as the very kees of Error to the end that he might with an army enter and invade again, when foever he would, And thus he conceived of it, that this would be the iffue of the civil and domestical war between brethren. That the victor wearied with war, should not be able to make head against Antioching These things wisely forecast and seen by the elder brother, were received with affent of the yonger and those that were affiliant about him: and the fifter between flood in very good flead, not by her good advice and counsel only, but also by her effectual praiers. And therefore by a general accord of all a peace was concluded, and the elder Prolomans received into Alexandria, without any gainfaying or resistance at all so much as of the very multitude; notwithstanding that during the war they were much decaied and weakned (not only by the fiege, but also after it was raised and the army gone from Alexandria) for want of all things, by reason that no provisions were brought thither from out of Egypt. Now, where as Antiochus should have taken great contentment and rejoyced much for this, in case he had brought his forces into Egypt for to restore Ptolomeus into his own cleare (which was the goodly presence and colourable shew that he made to all the States of Afra and Greece, when he received their embaffages, or fent forth his letters into all parts) fo it fell out, that he was so highly offended and displeased hereat, that he went in hand and prepared to make war now against them both much more eagerly and with greater malice than before against one alone. Presently he rigged and sent out his navy at sea to Cyprus; himself in person at & the beginning of the spring minding to invade Egypt marched forward with his army as far as into Calo-Syria. The Embassadors of Ptolomans encountred him in his journey about "Rhinocolura, and gave him thanks in behalf of their K, and master, for that by his means he had recovered the inheritance of his fathers Kingdom: requesting withal to maintain that benefit and good deed of

and force of arms, and not of a friend and ally to become a mortal enemy. His answer was, that he would neither call back his fleet nor withdraw his army upon any condition, unless he quit unto his use as well the whole Isle of Cyprus, as the City * Pelusium, together with the territory about the mouth of Nilus, called * Pelusiacum Ostium. And therewith he set him down a day, before which he expected to receive his answer as touching the accomplishment of the said conditions. After the day prefixed for the truce was past, as they failed in the mouth of Nilus neer Pelufium, the states along the deserts of Arabia yeelded. Then, being received of them that inhabite about Memphis, and the rest of the Ægyptians, partly with favor and good will, and partly for fear and constraint; by small journies he descended toward Alexandria. When he was passed over the river at Leusine (a place about 4 miles distant from Alexandria) the Roman Embassadors met him upon the way. After greetings and falutations at their first coming, he put forth his right hand to Popilius; but he delivered unto him a scroll written, and willed him before he did any thing else to read that script. After he had read the writing through, he answered that he would devise with his friends and confider what was best to be done. But Popilius according to his ordinary blunt manner of speech which he had by nature made a circle about the King with the rod that he had in his M hand, and withal, " Make me an answer (qd, he) I advise you such as I may report to the Senate, before you pass the compass of this circle. The King astonied at this so rude and violent a commandment, after he had staied and pansed a while: I will be content (qd, he) to do what soever the Senat shall ordain. Then and not before, Popilius gave the King his hand as to a friend and ally. Afterwards when Antiochus was departed out of Egypt by the day prefixed, the faid Embaff. or delegats having by their authority established concord also between the two brethren (who as yet were not throughly agreed) some of them failed to Cyprus, and from thence they sent away the fleet of Antiochus, which already had given an overthrow in battail to the Ægyptian fbips. This was a noble embassage and much renowned among those nations, for that thereby Egypt was undoubtedly taken from Antiochus, who was as good as possessed thereof already, and the N

Of the two Consuls that year, like as the one was famous in his place by this notable victory, so the other was little or nothing spoken of, by reason he had not matter of any great exploit to be emploied in. And first of all when he was assigned a certain day for the legions to meet, he entred into the temple without the lucky approbation of the auspices. And when the Augurs were moved and their advice required therin, they declared, that there was an error committed in the appointment of the faid day. In his voiage for France he kept his standing leaguet for the summer time about the mountains Sicimina and Papinus neer the plains called "Macri, And afterwards he wintred about the same places with the allies of the Latine nation. For the Roman legions, because the day was not rightly appointed for the affembly of the forces at the Rendes-vons, remained be- o hind at Rome. Also the Pretors, save only C. Pappr. Carbo, unto whose lot Sardinia was faln, went forth into their Provinces: and him the LL, of the Senate had ordained to attend upon his civill jurisdiction at Rome between citizens and forrainers. Popilius likewife, that embassage which was fent to Antiochus returned to Rome: wherehe made relation that the controversies between the two Kings were decided, & the army of Antiochus retired out of Egyptinto Syria, After this, came the Embasi, also of the Kings themselves. Those of Aniochus made report that the King their inheritance of the Kingdom restored again to the race of Prolomens,

a matter effeemed more of the peace approved by the Senat, than of any victory whatfoever; and obeied the orders fer downby the Roman Embassadors, no less than the very messengers coming with commandments directly from the Gods: and finally they tellified their own contentments and wished them great joy of their victory obtained saying that the King himself would have been with all his power at the atchieving thereof, in case he had been enjoined to perform any service. The Embaffadors of Prolomeus in the name jointly of their King and of Cleopatra rendred thanks unto them, acknowledging themselves more bound & beholden to the Senat and people of Ramethan to their own parents, yea, & more than to the immortal Gods; for by their good means they were first delivered from the most lamentable miseries of a siege, and had recovered their fathers Kingdom, which they were at the point to have lost for ever. The Senat returned this answer afeemed him, and in fo doing he highly contented and pleased the Senat and people of Rome. A-

Reain, That whereas Antiochus had been ruled by the Embassadors, therin he did well and as it begain if Prolomeus and Cleopatra the King and Queen of Agypt, had found any goodness and commodicy by them, the Senat was very glad therfore and rejoyced thereat and would endevour and work it foothat they might be perswaded that the greatest assurance and safeguard of their realm refled at all times most in the faithful protection of the people of Rome. This said, the Pretor C. Papyrius had in charge to fee that prefents and gifts were fent to these Embassadors according to the ancient custome. Then were letters brought out of Macedony to redouble the joy of the victory, importing that Perfeus was fure enough in the hands of the Conful.

When those Embassadors were dismissed and gone, much debate and argument there was be-C tween the Embassadors of the Pisans and Lunenies. They of Pisa complained that they were dilfeized & driven out of their territory by the Roman coloners: contrary wife, those of Lena plain-ly averred, that the Land in controversy had ben set out and assigned for them by the Triumvirs. The Senat herenpon fent five men as commissioners to make inquisition into the limits of the faid territory and to determine accordingly, and those were Q. Fabius Butso, P. Cornelius Blasso, T. Sempronius Mulca, L. Navius Balbus, and C. Apulius Saturninus. There camelike wile a folemnembaffage fent in common from Eumenes, Artalus, and Atheraus, all three brethren to notify the joy and contentment which they took for the Romans victory. Moreover, L. Manlius the treasurer was ready at Puteoli to receive and welcome Malgabathe fon of K. Mal milla, as he should disbark and fer on land: for fent he was of purpose with money to meet him upon the way, to conduct. D him also and bring him to Rome at the cities charges. He was no sooner come, but immediatly audience was given him in the Senat, 18 This yong Prince spake in such fort as the things which of "themselves were acceptable enough indeed, he graced and made more worthy of acceptance by " his good words. He rehearled what forces of foot and horie both, how many Elephants, whan

As "for Masanista sufficed he was, and evermore would rest contented with that overplus which the people of Rome might leave and spare for him. Thus much (od he) I had in charge and commisfrom from my fathers own mouth, when I departed and took my leave of him: but afterwards Certain horimen riding post overtook me, to let me understand that Macedony was subdued; and to charge me, that after I had fignified our joy in your behalf I should shew unto the Senat, that F' my father took luch concentment therin, that he would gladly come to Rome, to offer facrifice

Moreover that the people of Rome acknowledged how they had received great help at his hands in the 5. that Hanno the fon of Amilear should be sent hostage in place of another Carthaginian (whose H name is not known;) but the Senat answered, That they thought it not meet to demand buffages at the pleasure of Majaniffa. The treasurer was commanded by order from the Senar, to buy certain presents for to bestow upon this yong Prince, namely, as much plate as might atise out of an 100 pound weight of filver : alfo to accompany him as far as Piteoli; to defray all his charges during his abode within Italy; and to hire two ships for to transport and conduct him & his princely traminto Africk. To all his retinue as well bond as free there was allowance made of apparel.

Not long after, were letters brought asconcerning Milagenes the fecond fon of Majaniffai who after that Paulus had vanquished Perfeus, was sent home by the said Paulus into Africk with his Cavalry : but as he failed, was driven (fick as he was) upon Brundafium with three thips only, for that the rest of the seet was dispersed in the Adriatick Sea, Stertimins the treasurer was sent to I him at Brundussum, with the like gifts as were bestowed upon his brother at Rome, and a charge

By vertue of an act granted out of the Senat, the Libertins [, the fons of freed men] were enrolled into the four tribes of the City, all fave those who had a son above five years old; with express commandment, That when they were to be enrolled at the review next ensuing their goods alfo should be valued, and they accordingly entred into the subsidy books; namely, That as many of them as possessed any manor or manors in the countrey, effeemed better worth than 30000 Sefterces, should be enrolled and affessed. This ordinance being thus observed, Claudius denied * This bath re- flatly, that the Cenfor had authority to * take from any particular person, and much less from a whole state and degree of men, the right and liberty of suffrages, without the warrant and ordiname of the people; for fay, that he have power to the same out of his tribe, (which is nothing elie but to command him to charge his tribe) it for oweth not then, that he may disposses and displace him out of all the 35 tribes, which is as much as to strike him out of the number of citizens, and deprive him quite of his freedom and burgeoffie : and is not (I fay) to limit and fet down in what rank he shall be enrolled, but to exclude him full and wholly out of all enrolment, This dispute and debate passed between them; untill at last they grew to this point, that of the four City tribes, they should cast lots openly in the Hall and Cloister of Libertas for one tribe, in which all they should be registred and comprised, who had been visitins sometimes and were enfran hifed. Now this lot fell to the tribe Exquilanca. Then Tib. Gracehus pronounced, That ordained it was to enrol initall the Libertins. Great honour and reputation with the Senat gained L. the Ceniors by this act: Sempranius likewise wan much thanks therefore, because he had persisted constantly in that good enterprise so well commensed: and Claudius went not without his due thank, for that he was no hindrance to this proceeding. In this review and furvey taken by the Ceniors, more Senators were removed and pur out of the councel, yea, and more Gentlemen commanded to fell their horses of service, than by other Censors in former time. And all those by both of them joyntly were not only displaced out of their tribes, and made no better than Erarii (i, to lose their voice) but also to pay all taxes whatsoever to the utmost, And look who was noted and difgraced by the one, had no relief nor hope to recover his credit and place by the other. Now when these Censors demanded, That according to a custome and order, they might be allowed a years space and two months, to look into the reparations of the publick edifices, that M they were maintained wind-tight and water-tight; as alfo to fee whether they who had undertaken to finish cettain works at a price, had performed their bargain accordingly: Cn. Tremellins a Tribune interposed himself and denied this demand, for anger that he was not chosen and taken into the Senat. The lame year C. C. cereius dedicated a chappel in the Albane mount, which he had vowed five years before. Alfo that year was L. Post humins Albinus en Ralled a Flamine of Mars. The Confuls Q. Elius and M. Junius propounded in the Senate, as touching the government of their Provinces: and the LL, ordained, That Spain froud be divided again into two Provinces, which had been united in one during the Macedonian war: also that the lame L. Panlar and L. Anicius (hould defend and keep in obedience as before, Macedony and Hipsianin, muil fisch time as they by the advice of certain deputed commissioners, had both composed all matters and af N fairs difordered and troubled by the wars; and also reformed the estate of that feaths, by finducing it into a new form. The Provinces assigned unto the Confols were Pifa and Good, and they had the command of two legions of footmen, and four hundred horsemen apeete. The Pretors had their lots for government as followeth: The civil jurisdiction over citizens fell to Q. Coffins, and over firangets to M. Juvencius Talva; Tib. Claudius Nero was L. deputy & Sielly Cal Fulvincof the bither Spain, and C. Licinius Nerva of the fareher : laft of ally A. Manthis Torquatus was appointed to the government of Sardinia; but into his province he could not go, by occasion that he was detained at home by vertue of an ach of the Senat, to make inquifition finto certain fellonious and capital crimes. After this confultation there was in the Senit as conching the prodigies which were reported. The chappel of the Panais (protestors of the Gity) in Pelia was imitten with thunder and lightning. Allo in the Town Minerviane, two gates and a good part of the wallfelt the like harm. At Anaghia it had rained earth, and ho gianne incompensation the skie a burning flame; Moreover, M. Valerius a citizen of Rome gave knowledge schat in Calatia within the publick territory of that City, for the space of three dayes and two nights toge-

proclaimed a publick supplication of the people for one day, and sacrificed fifty goats in the common market place of the City. Also in regard of the other prodigies, a supplication was holden another day, and men did their devotions at every altar of the Gods; greater beafts were killed for facrifices, and the City was folemnly cleanfed and purged. This done, as touching the honor of the immortal Gods, the Senat ordained, that for a funch as the two Kings Perfeus & Gentius their enemies were overcome, and now at the devotion of the people of Rome, together with Macedone and Illericum, Q. Callina and M. Juventine the Presots hould give order for as great oblations to be offred unto the Gods at every thrine and altar as had been heretotore (when App. Claudies and M. Sempronius were Copiuls for the defeat of King Antioches, Then they ordained cert tain delegats, by whose advice L. Paulus and L. Anicius the two Generals, might set all affairs in B order, namely, ten into Macedony, and five into Illyricum. For Macedony were nominated A. Polihuming Luscus and C. Clauding, (who both had been Cenfors) C. Licinius Craffin, late companion to Paulus in the Consulship, and who at that present had the government of Gaul continued him. To these delegats above named, men of Consular dignity all by their calling, were adjoined in commission Cn. Domitius Anobarbus, Ser. Cornelius Sylla, L. Junius, C. Antificus Labeo, T. Numilius Taraninienlis, and Aulus Terentius Varro, For Illyricum were thele named, P. Elius Lions; one that had been Conful, C. Cicercina and Cn. Babina Tamphilm (this Babina had been Pretor but the former year, and Cicereius many years patt) P. Terentius Tufcivicanus, and P. Marilius. Then the Confuls being advertised by the LL, of the Senat, that (for almuch as one of them must succeed C. Licinius in Gaul, who was nominated one of the delegats) they should part their Pro-

C vinces between them either by accordand agreement, or by lot make choice of the fortune of lottery, So Pilafell to M. Tunius (but before he went into his province, he had in charge to brings into the Senat, those embassies which from all parts were come to Rome for to declare their joy in the behalf of the people of Rome) and Gaul to Q. Elint.

Albeit fuch personages were sent, as by whose lage counsel good hope there was, that the chief commanders of the Roman armies would pais no decree unbeseeming either the clemency of Majesty of the people of Rome, yet debated it was in the Senat about the sum and principal points of all their couniels and defigns; to the end that the faid Legats might cary unto the Generals all things plotted already and begun to their hands at home in the City. In the first place ordained it. was. That the Macedonians and Illyrians remain free and enjoy their liberties, that all nations of the earth might fee, that the drift of the Roman armies and forces was not to bring free states in to servitude, but contrarywise to reduce those that were in bondage to liberty, to the end that those nations which now enjoied freedom might be secured under their safeguard and protection Both of furery and of perpetuity, and fuch as lived in subjection under the Kings, might both for the present time find their government more mild and righteous for that respect which the Kings have of the people of Rome; and also, if it fortuned hereaster, that there should be wat between the people of Rome and their Kings, they might be affured that the iffue of thole wars would bring victory to the Romans, and procure liberty to themselves. Also agreed it was that there should be no more farming our of the metal mines in Macedony, albeit they yeelded a great revenue ; nor yet of publick lands and possessions in the countrey: for possible it was not that these matters E should be practised and followed without publicans; and where those intermeddle & have ought to do then it must needs follow, that either the publick fight and prerogative of the State be an-fulled or the liberty of allies come to nothing. Neither were the Macedonians themselves able to exercise the same : for look where the ministers and managers of any thing see a booty presented before their eyes, there, occasions of sedition and contention will never be wanting. Moteover, concluded it was, that there should be no common and general counsel of the whole nation, for, fear left at any time the lewd sulgar people having by the Senat liberty granted unto them tending unto a good and wholfome moderation and equality of the State (hould abuse the same and draw it to a milchievous and peltilent licentioniness. But they thought it good policy to divide Magedon into four quarters and counties, that each one might have their feveral countel? likewife in F was supposed to stand with good reason and equity, that they should pay the one moity of that tribute which they were wont to yeeld unto their KK. Semblable commission and like directions they had for Illyricum. As or all other matters, referred they were to the discretion of the Geneticulars, according to the occurrents prefented unto them in the managing of their affairs, Among many and lundry Emballadors of Kings, nations, and flates, Actalus the brother of K. Emmens most of all others amused mens minds, and drew their eyes upon him: for by them who had born arms together with him in that war, welcomed he was much more heartily, and received with a rearrest country than if Emmens the K, himself had come. Two occasions there were outwardly preferenced, and those carrying a good flew of horiety and credit, which brought him to a flower the doe a granulation of refliment of for low (as meet it was) for that victory, wherin him delent his delping band into other, a complaint of French tumultuous wars and the bloody hoffility of Adwire their King, by which means his brothers Kingdom was in great jeopardy. But there lay abother thing hidden underneath namely, an inward and ferret hope that he conceived of home nors and rewards from the Senat, which hardly he could feeth to aim & reach unto, without fome unkindnels and violence offered to brotherly duty and affection. For some there were even of the Romans alto who did him no good but gave him bad counsel, drew on his appetite with fair, hopes, and let him a longing, feeding him with these and such like conceits. That in Rome this H was the opinion entertained of Arasus and Emmens, as if the one of them were a fueral tast and sure to the Romans; the other an ally, sound and faithful neither to the Romans not yet to Perfens: and therefore hard it were to set down and say, Whether of the wain would be more easily obtained at the Senats hands, namely, a fuit made in his own name for his preferment, or a dem of some hard course against his brother so bent were all men in general to grant any thing to Attalus, and to deny every thing to Eumenes. Attalus (as the lequel and proof shewed) was plant to those persons whose desires reach at all that hope promifeth, had not the sage admonition of one friend come between to bridle his affections, ravished and transported so as they were with the amiable afpect and fawning flattery of his own good fortune. He had about him at that time one Stratius a Phylician, fent by Eumenes (who refled not fecure of his brothers loyalty Jeo Rome, I of purpose for to lie in espial and observe all that Attalus did and to advise him faithfully, if he saw him tread awry and practife ought against his duty and allegeance. When he came unto him he found his ears already possessed, and his spirit tempted and sollicited beforehand: how beit taking his times and waiting opportunities, he went roundly to work and fluck to it close until he had fet all up again which was at the point to run on end, and fall to the ground. He alledged and laid these remonstrances before his eyes, saying, "That Kingdoms have grown mighty, some by one emeans, some by others; but as for theirs, being but newly erected, as grounded upon no strength er of ancient foundations, it flood upright only by the mutual concord of him and his brethren, in that one of them beareth the name and title of King, wearing the diadem and crown alone upon his head, but in effect all three brethren be KK. These and such like important perswallons prevailed with Arralusand setted deeply in his mind. Therefore being admitted into the Senar, after he had wilhed joy upto them and ly in his mind. Therefore being admitted into the Senar after he had winded joy into them, and protefled his own for the late victory, he had and declared his own or many protefled his own or the late victory, he had and declared his own or marking and good fervice in that was the layors allo (fuch as they were idone by his brother, and left of all the revolt of the Gauls lately broken out with great troubles and commotions. His pertitor to the Senate was not been declared their Emphaghaders unto them by whose conflictions can apply a property in the general of their Emphaghaders unto them by whose conflictions and demanded to have a property in the general of the realm; he made a special fur for himself; and demanded to have Arward given unto him. Amono many Embanies of Ana and Orece the Rhodian Emballadors were fifoll marked and looked monthroughout all the City for where at first they were all trim and goodly to be feen in their white and highly apparel; as decent it was for them throwood ferm to congratular for the victory for it they had worn black or been poorly arrafed, it might have been confirmed, that they mourned for the misfortune and calamity of Perfeus) after that M. Times the Cornel brake with the II. of the Senat (and all that while the faid Embaffadors flood without in the common place Comitium) to confider and advise, whether they would allow lodging, preferes and give andience in the Senat unto them: they resolved and were of opinion to observe no rights not onflomes of holpitality with them. Then went the Conful out of the Senat : unto whom when the Rhodians faid that they were come to rejoyce in their behalf for the late victory, and withal, to Banfwer in the name of their City to certain crimes wherewith they were charged, requelling that they might fpeak before the Senat and be heard with indifference: the Conful pronounced aloud unto them, That the custome indeed of the Romans was to entreat their allies and friends gracioully, and among other matters of courtely and hospitality which they afforded unto their to grant them also a day of hearing in the Senat; but the Rhodians had not demeaned themselves disring the war, in such fort, as to be reckoned in the number of lovers and affociats. At the hearing of these words they cast themselves all prostrat on the ground, beseeching the Consul and all those that were present, not to suffer that false imputations of late surmised should against a I reason prejudice the Rhodians more, than their good deferts of old (whereof them elves were sufficient witnesses) stand them in stead. And presently after they had put on simple apparel and mourning C weeds, they went about from house to house visiting the principal persons of the City, humbly befeeching them with tears, to hear their cause before they were condemned. M. Juvencius Talva the Pretor or L, chief justice for the pleas between citizens and flrangers, was the only agent that provoked and incited the people against the Rhodians: nay, he had promulged and published a bill to this effect, That war might be denounced against the Rhodians; alio, that out of the Magistrats for that year they would make choice of some one to be sent as Admiral with a fleet for the managing of that war: hoping that himself should be the man. But this action and proceeding of his was croffed by M. Antonius and M. Pomponius, two Tribuns of the commons. Over and besides, the Pretor, to say a truth, had broached this matter after a new and thrange fashion. and to the evil example of future times, in that he preferred a bill unto the people of his own head Di alone, without asking the advice of the Senat, or making the Confuls acquainted therewith: and that in this manner and form, Pleaseth it you, and is it your will, that war be proclaimed against the Rhodians? whereas alwaies before-time, in queffion of war, the Senats advice was first taken. and then the thing was proposed unto the people. Likewise the Tribuns of the commons for their part, did more than they might, and athing not warrantable by any precedent. For it was a custom and tradition observed ever of old, that no person should interpole his negative to cross any bills before that privat men in particular had their course and turn granted, both to perswade or diffwadethe fame, by which means many a time it fell out, that even they who never projetled nor means to oppole themselves: being moved and induced by the gessions of those that stood up to diffwade, and perceiving also by them the inconveniences of such a bill, would step between and E dash all: yes, and contrary wife fuch as came of purpose to cross and nip the same being convinced by the authority and born down by the important arguments all edged by those that enforced the said bill, would desist and succease. Thus the Pretors and Tribless strove much who should do every thing more unfeasonably than others. The Tribuns impeached and staid the hastines of the Pretor, interpoling their negative before the time; and deferring the matter until the coming of the L. General. Whether we have 'Inebegio.

After their oration in this manner uttered, they fell down again all profitat. and as humble suppliant estioons pur forth and shook their branches of the olive, until at length they were raifed up on their feet, and so departed out of the Senat. Then began the LL, within, to give their opinions and pals their tentences of them. The heaviest enemies and most malicions bent against the Rhodians, were those, who had conducted the war of Macedony, as Consuls, Pretors or Lieutenants but M. Porcius Cato was their only patron that flood to them and supported their cause right earnestly a man otherwise by nature sowre and levere, but as then he shewed himfelf a mild and gracious Senator. I will not infert here the lively portraiture and refemblance of that copious and eloquent person, by relating the flowing speech which he then delivered his very oration is extant in writing, and contained in the fifth book of his Origenes. In fine, the Rhodians received such an answer, as they neither were concluded enemies, not yet remained in the nature and quality of friends. The principal persons of this their embassage, were Philocrates and Alixmedes. Ordered it was & agreed between them, That Philocrates (with some of his fellows) should report this answer at Rhodes; and that Astymedes (with the reft) should stay behind at Rome, to to know what was practifed and done there, and give intelligence thereof accordingly to their citizens at home. For that present the LL, of the Senat gave them in charge, to remove their Captains and Governours by a certain day out of Lycia and Caria. These news related at Rhodes, importing matter (init self considered) of grief & heavines, turned into joy, in regard that they were eased from the sear of a greater mischief, for they doubted forethat they should have had hot war. And therfore presently they ordained for the Romans a crown amounting to the value of 20000 pieces of gold, and with this present they sent Theodotus the Admiral of their navy in embassage A will and defire they had to make fuit unto the Romans for affociation: but fo, as no act and ordinance of the people should be entred therof, nor any instrument engrossed as touching it. And this they did, to avoid the greater shame and ignominy of repulse, if haply they missed of their purpose, and could not obtain. The Admiral alone had this priviledg, and was permitted to treat of that matter, without any bill at all either published or enacted by the people. For in so many years before they had continued in amity with the Romans in such fort, as they never linked and sted themselves unto them by any formal deed and covenant upon record, and that for no other reason in the world, but becau'e they would neither cut the kings off from all hope of their aid, if haply any of them might fland in such need, nor disable themelves of the possibility they had to reap some fruit & receive good of their bounty and prosperity. But surely at this time (me thinks) they ought to have fought fadly and in good earnest for their society, not fo much for fafety and fecurity against others (for none they seared at all but only the Romans) as to be rid of the suspition and jealoufy which the Romans had of them. About the same time the Caunians also revolted from them, and they of Myleffa took certain Towns of the Euromestians. Now were the hearts of these Rhodians within the City not so much broken or abated, but they saw well enough that if the Romans took from them Lycia and Caria, all the rest would either by way of tevolt put themselves in liberty and strake off the yoke of their subjection, or else be surprised and feized by the neighbour nations bordering upon them and that then they should be pent up and M that within the compass of a small Isle and the strands of a barren soil, not able to nourish and maintain the inhabitants offo great and populous a City. Therefore with all speed they dispatched and jent forth their youth, and not only forced the Caunians, not with flanding they had joined unto them the aid of the Cybirats) to their obeisance, but also in battel neer Orthofia overcome, the Mylasseans and Alabandians; who having disleized the Euronensians of their province, advanced jointly with their united armies against them. Whiles these affairs thus passed there, whiles some occurrents fell out in Macedony, and others

likewise at Rome, L. Anicius having subdued King Gentius (as is beforefaid) and brought him under his own hand, placed a gaftison in Scode a, the Kings roial seat, and appointed Gabinius the Cap-N rain thereof: but in Rhizon and Olcinia two commodious cities of good importance; he ordained C.Licinius the Governor, Having thus made over the rule of Illyricam unto these twain; himself with the rest of the army went into Epirus. Where the Town Phanota was the first that yeelded unto him, and the whole multitude of the people cameforth to meet him with their infules in token of submission. After he had put a garrison in this place also he passed over into the country of Moloffis, where he received the furrender of all the Towns thereof, excepting Paffaron, Termon, Phylacum, and Horreum. And then heled his army first against Passaron. The principal men and rulers of that City were Antinous and Theodotus, men of mark and name, as well for the favor they bare to Perfeus, as the hatred they caried to the Romans: the only persons who had counselled and periwaded the whole nation to revolt from the Romans. These two having guilty consciences within them for their privat trespais, and being past all hope of finding any grace and pardon, thut the gates of the City, to the end that they might perish with the overthrow of ally and be overwhelmed with the total ruin of their own country; and therewith they exhorted the unnititude to preser present death before servitude end slavery. No man durst once open his mouth to contradict these so great and mighty persons. At length a certain noble yong Gentleman, named also Theodotus, with whom the greater dread from the Romans abroad prevailed more and overcame

the less fear of the rulers at home. "What ail ye my masters (qd.he) and fellow citizens, what race and madness haunteth you to enwrap and interess the whole City in the fault and folly of these "two persons? Certainly, I have often heard of men that for their countrey have willingly lost stheir lives, but to think it meet, that their countrey should perish for them, these are the first "that ever were known. Why rather open we not our gates and submit our selves to that empire. "into which the whole world befides is jubject. As he spake these words, the multitude followed him toward the gates: which when Antinous & Theodorus law, they made no more ado, but brake upon the first corps de guard of the enemies which they came unto and exposing their bodies to the fwords point, were foon killed, and the Town was yeelded into the hands of the Romans. Tegmon alfo. upon the like wilfull obstinacy of Prince Cephalo, had shut their gates, but after that he was a flain, the Town was taken by furrender. And neither Phylace nor Horreum would abide the affault Having thus quieted Epirus, and bestowed his forces by garrisons in diverse commodious Towns for the winter time, he returned into Illyricam: where he held a general affembly at Scodra, to which he had summoned the principal States of the whole nation, and whither also there were arrived five delegates from Rome, And there in this frequent and folemn fession, he pronounced from the Tribunal feat, by the advice of the countel affiftant unto him, That the Senate and people of Rome ordained the Illyrians to live free and enjoy liberty, and that himself would withdraw the garrisons out of their Towns, Fortrelles, and Castles, As for the Isleans, Taulantians, Tirustians in the Daffaretians countrey, Rhizonits and Olcianats (for that whiles Gentius his fortune food upright they had ranged with the Romans) he declared them not only free, but also exempt and pri-C viledged from all tributs. The Doarfians also, for leaving Caravanius, and passing with their armies to fide with the Romans, he endowed with the like immunity. They of Scody a, Duffard, and Selepita, with the rest of the Illyrians, were to pay the one moity of the tribute which they had veelded to the King. After this he divided Illyricum into three cantons : the one of them he made of those before named: the second, all the Labeats: and the third, of the Agravonits Rhezonits, Olciniats and those that bound and border upon them. Having set down this order in Illyricum, he returned to Paffaroa City in Epirus, there to lie for the winter time. Whiles these things hapned in Illyricum, Paulus before the coming of the ten Legats, sent Q. Maximus his fon (who was now lately returned from Rome) to the Jaccage of Eginium and Agaffa. The quarrel against Agaffa, was, for that they having delivered the Town on eto Martins the Conful, and therwith of their own accord craved the alliance of the people of Rome, revolted notwithstanding afterwards to Perfeus. As for the Æginians, they had committed a late and fresh teefpals: for giving no credit to the fame that was voiced of the Romans victory they cruelly handled certain Roman fouldiers, who were entred into their City. Moreover, he fent L. Posthumius likewile to raplack in hollile manner the City of the Anians, for that they had perfifted in arms more fliffy than the other neighbour Cities. Now was it about that leafon of the year which men call Autumn : in the beginning whereof, so soon as he had determined to ride a circuit and visit all Greece round, and to fee those places whereof there went so great a name, and which were more renowned by hear-fay than known by fight of eyeshe left C. Sulpitius Gallus for the command and guard of the camp, & let forward in his progress, accompanied with no great train, And being guar-E ded of the one hand with his own ion Scipio, and on the other, with At henaus the brother of King Emmaner, he passed through Thessay, toward the samous Oracle at Delphys. Where, after he had specificed to Apollo, he destined and appointed those Columns & Pillars (which were begun in the porchiof that Temple, and wherupon the statutes of King Perfeus should have been erected) for to fultain and bear the statues of himself with the title Victorious. He visited also the temples of Tanto descend that would have the benefit of the Oracle, and know the will of the Gods; after facrifice also done, to figure and Hereisma, whose temple there is to be seen he went down to Chalcis; observed the frith of Euripus, and that Island which in times plat was united & joined to the firm Countent by a bridg. From Chalcis he crossed over to Autis three miles distant from thence, a pore embled for the rode some time there of an american letter, constitute of a thousand fail. Being three, he went to the semple of Disnay, where that King of Kings (Agamemons) offered his own a standard of the semple of Disnay, where that King of Kings (Agamemons) offered his own a standard of the semple of Disnay, where that King of Kings (Agamemons) offered his own a standard of the semple of Disnay, the semple of Disnay, the semple of Disnay of Semple of the Semple of Disnay of Semple of Disnay of Semple of Disnay of Semple of Disnay of Semple of Semple of Disnay of Semple of Semple of Disnay of Semple of Disnay of Semple of Semple of Disnay of Semple of Disnay of Semple of parable to the reft, yet of great name for the famous temple of Escalopine, which standeth 5 miles # from the City, where at this day are to be feen the marks and tokens of the empty places from whence the oblations have been plucked away : but then a rich place it was and full of those offrings and gifts, which difeated persons had confectated to that God in recompence and reward for those soveraign salves and wholesom remedies which they there found, From thence he came to Lacedamen a City memorable not for any magnificence of stately works and buildings, but for good discipline and orders there observed, From whence passing through Megalopolis, he ascended up to Olympia: where among other things there to be feen, he beheld Jupiter as it were represented even before his eies, whereat he was much moved in spirit. And therfore as if he had been to facrifice in the capitol, he commanded a facrifice to be prepared with more flate and magnific cence than ordinary. Thus having vifited all Greece over without any fearch and enquiry made. how men either in general or particular stood affected in the war against Perfess, (because he would not trouble and disquier the minds of the allies with any fearful occurrent) as he returned toward Demetrias, he was encountred by the way with a number of Ætolians allclad in doleful & mourning array. And when he wondred and asked what the matter might be, he was given to understand that 550 of their principal men of name, were by Lycifem and Tifippm maffacted, who with the help of certain Roman fouldiers fent from Bebine the Governor, had befet their Senat: that the rest were driven into exist and the goods as well of those who were murdered, as also of the banished persons were now possessed by their accusers. He commanded them to attend upon him at Amphipolis, and when himself had communed & conferred at Demetrias with Cn. Offavius. after he once heard that the ten legats had passed the seas, the laid aside all other affairs, and went directly to Apollonia there to meet with them. To which place when Perfess came to meet him. for he having over-large liberty of poilon, was come from Amphipelis & that was a dales journey offiunto the K.he shewed good countenance and gave him good and gracious words, but after he was returned to the camp at Amphipelis, he sharply checked and rebuked, as men say, C. Sulpitius, first for suffering Perfeus to range so loosly and so far off from him, all over the province : secondly for giving his fouldiers fo much liberty as to pluck the titles from off the walls [and houses] of the City to cover the places of their winter harbour; and therewith he commanded that the tiles should be carried thither again where they had them, and the houses to be repaired as sufficiently as before. As for Perfeus and his elder fon Philip, he delivered unto A. Posthumius to be kept in fafe cull ody: but his daughter and yonger for, he fent for to Amphipolis from Samethrace, and used them with all courtefy and kind intertainment as possibly he could. When the day was come, on which he appointed that ten principal burgeffes out of every City should repair to Amphipolis & that all the Kings letters and writings in what place foever to be found, should be fought up & represented there together with all his mony; he sat him down upon the tribunal seat, together with the ten legats from Rome, and the whole multitude of the Macedonians were gathered round about him. Albeit they had been used to subjection under the King, yet this new Tribunal carried with it a form and shew of a terrible government namely, when they saw the tipstayes is builtiers to keep the doors and places of entry, the publick crief and the lergeant : ftrange matters all unto their eies and ears & whereto they had not been accustomed, able to strike a terror to allies much more then, to conquered enemies. After filence made by the crier, Paulus pronounced in the Latine congue, what the Senats pleasure was to be done, and what himself with the advice of his Councel affiliant about him had thought upon and fet down : all which points Cn. Off avins the Pretor for he also was in place) interpreted and related again in the Greek language. Imprimis, they ardalned the Lacedamonians to be free, to have and enjoy the same Cities and territories, to nie and exercise their own Laws to create yearly Magistrats, and to pay half of that tribute to the people of Rome, which they used to pay unto their Kings, Item, to divide Macedon; into 4 quarters. The one, and that the principal for to contain all the country between the 2 rivers Strymon and Neffus; to which part there should be laid the tract on the farther side of the river Nessus Eastward (where Perseus held Towns, Castles and Cities) excepting Anns, Maronea, and Abdera: also beyond Ser mon Westward all the Bifaltique territory, together with Heraclea, which they call Syntice. For the N fecond, all those parts which on the East-fide the river Serymon encloseth, except Syntice, Heracles, & the Bifaltes : also on the West, what soever is bounded with the river A tim, together with the Paonians lying to it, who inhabit upon the river Axins Eastward. The third quarter was that, which Axius from the east and Peneus the river from the west do compassiand to the north-side is limited with the mountain Bora, and to this portion was adjoined the track of Paonia, which Coafterh along the river Axins toward the west: Edeffa also and Berrhaa were annexed thereo. The fourth was beyond the mountain Bora, confining on the one fide upon Illyricum, & on the other upon Epirus. The head cities of every quarter where they should hold their sessions and councels he appointed thele: For the first, Amphipolis: The falonica for the fecond; In the third Pollaist Polsgonia in the fourth. To these places he ordained that by summons they should repair, and hold the affemblies of each quarter; this her the mony to be brought; and there the magistrats to be created, Item, he declared and pronounced that it should not be lawful for any person to contract mariage, neither to have commerce & trafficktogether in buying or felling of lands or tenements without the limits of their own division. Item, that in their mines they should no more dig for filver and gold: but for Iron and brafs they had permission. And these that had the profit theref, were to pay the one half of the old rent, which they were wont to yeeld and grant unto the King, Item, he for-

A bad them to use any more forrain falt brought from out of other parts, When the Dardanians but in their claim for Paonia, for that it had sometime been their appurrenance, and also confined upon their country; he pronounced freedom to all those who had been subjects to K. Perfem, But afterwards, when they could not obtain Paonia, he granted into them the commodity of the traffick for falt; and he charged the inhabitants of the faid country to cary it to Stobi in Paonicand he fet them down a certain price. Item, he debarred them from felling any thip-timber themselves, and from suffering any others. Unto those countries which bordered upon the Barbarians (and except the third quarter all the rest confined upon them) he granted that they might keep armed garrifons upon their frontiers and marches. These Acts and ordinances thus published the first day of the feffion, wrought diverily in the minds of men. Freedom granted beyond their expectation, and R the easment in the yearly tribute, comforted their spirits and made them look up, But by the interruption of the commerce & traffick one region with another, they feemed like creatures difmentbred and plucked a under joint-meal, to as having need one of another, yet they had no mutual & reciprocal use and intercourse. In so much as the Macedonians themselves knew full little how big and large Macedony was, and how commodiously it was divided, so as each part was sufficient in it self without the help of others. The first region containeth the Bifalta who inhabit beyond the river Nessus and about Strymon, the most valiant men of all the rest : besides, it hath many proper commodities by it felf as well fruits of the earth as mines of metals, together with the opportunity and commodious fituation of Amphipolis, which as a frontier-bar floppeth all avenues on the eath fide into Macedony. The second quarter hath in it two most samous and frequented cities, The list Clonica and Calsandrias & Pallene, a fertile & fruitful land, Besides, the maritime commodities which the havens at Torone and the head of Athor (and it they call the post or rode of Eneas) do yeeld; to fay nothing of other bayes lying handsomely; some toward the Iland Euben, others toward Hellespont. The third connercy containeth thefamous cities Edefia, Barhaa and Pellas the warlike nation of the Veteil, and many Gauls and Illyrians besides who there inhabit, notable men all of action & execution. The fourth region is peopled with the Eordians, Linceftians, and Pelagonians unto whom, the provinces Atintania, Stymphalis, and Eliminia are adjoyned. All this quarter is cold, rough and hard to dwell in The nature of the inhabitants is likewife furable to the foil & the fiercer they are by reason of the barbarous nations their neighbours, who one whole find them occupied with war, and otherwhiles mingle their rites and fashions, with theirs in time of peace. D When Macedony was thus divided and each part diftinguished by their several uses & commodities, he appointed a general review to be made and enrolment of all the Macedonians; having declared unto them before, that he purposed to give laws unto them. This done, the Etolians were cited and called next and in the whole course of the commission as conching them and their affairs, more inquisition there was, who savoured the Romans, and who affected the King, than of any that either had done or inferred wrong, The murderers were found unguilty and abfolved and the banifi ment of the earlied was as much as owechas their death. juffified who were massacred: A. Babius only was convided and condemned, for that he had sene Roman fouldiers to execute the faid butchery. This iffue of the Etolians cause, puffed up the spie tits of all those who had fided with the Romans, throughout all the nations and cities of Greece, Ein fuch fort as they grew to a pride intolerable: but contratywile put down & abaled under their feet, as many as were suffected any water to have cast a favor and born good will to the King, The principal flates-men of their cities were of three forts:two of them, were skillful in the art of foothing, & either by submitting and subjecting under the RomanEmpire, or winding within the fa-, vo, and friendshiplof the KK grew infinitly rich and mighty themselves in privat, with the publick oppression and undoing of their countrey; the third between, sung a mean, and was cross to the other, men that flood for the defence of their liberties and maintenance of laws, who as they were more dearly beloved of their neighbours at home, to they were less gracious and of credit with firangers abroad. The favorits and supposts only of the Romans, were advanced by their profession ty: they alone lat in place of government, they were employed in all emballages, and none but they, p. These being there present in great, number coming out of Peloponnes un Banting and from other trequeni affemblics of Greece, filled the heads of the ten delegats and high commissioners bozzing into their cars, that not they alone who openly were feen in their bravery and vanity of spirit, vanting themselves for the hosts and friends of King Perfess, but many more besides under hand took part with him and favoured his proceedings; as for the rest (under a colour of maintaining liberty) practiled in all their counsels and complotted against the Romans what they could: and liberty) practifed in all their counfels and completted against the Romans what they could: and relyer would the Greek Nations abide long in their allegeance, unlefs the hearts of that side were jakendayan and booken; and their authority only cherished, confirmed, and friengelined, who regarded nothing elle but the empire and loveraignty of the Romans. When their had all offermed and perfected divert by maner sent for they were by the letters militare of the General, our of the Adams, Accessoring, Eprice, and Bestia, 19 give their strendance and follow him to some, there to salway the taufe, Bus into Achasiwo of the high, Commissioners were fern maneral, G. Claurish and C. Demains, who perforally should summon them by vertue at their ediff. And this was since for two confidences in the only, because they thought vertue at the Achasas were more confident and configuous, and their core would not obey the summons by letters, and year adventurables. The summer of their lives in the sales, who goad presentance of their lives in other casic why they would be presented.

to give them summons was this, that amongst the Kings records and rols they had sound the let- H ters of the principal Statesmen of other nations; but of the Achaens there appeared no writing ar all under their hands, and therefore the imputations charged upon them, were nothing evident

After the Atolians were difmiffed, the nation of the Acarnanians was cited and called inco place: as for them, there was no change nor alteration; only Lencas was exempt from doing fervice to the high court and general affembly of the Acamanians. As they followed the inquintion Hill farther and farther, making enquiry who either in publick or private had taken part with the King they extended their commission as far as into Assaind sent Labeo to demolish and race Anriff a City in the Isle Lesbos, and to translate the inhabitants thereof to Methymna: the pretence was, for that they had given harbor in their haven to the provisions of Antenor the Kings Admiral, at what time as he hovered and ranged about Leibos with his pinnaces. Two there werethat r loft their heads,men of quality and great worth, to wit, Andronics the Etolian, fon of Andronic em, for that he followed his father and bare arms against the people of Rome; and Necna Theban, by whose advice and perswasion they had contracted a society with Persens,

After this enquest offorrain causes interposed and coming between, the affembly of the Macedomians was called again; wherein as touching the state of Macedony, pronounced, and published it was, That there should becertain Senators chosen, whom they call Synedri, by whose counsel the common-weal should be managed and governed. After this, were the names read of the principal Macedonians, whom he appointed (together with their children as many as were above fifteen years of age) to go before into Italy. This of first was thought to be an hard and cruel course, but anon it appeared to the multitude of the Macedonians that it was all done for their liberty. For * nominated there were, the Kirgs friends and gallants of his court, the commanders of armies, the Admirals of the fleets, and the Captains of the garrifons, who were wont to serve the King basely, but to over-rule others proudly and imperiously : some exceeding rich and wealthy others spending above the proportion of their revenues and living : all faring at their schle, and arraied in apparel like KK. not one carying with him the civil mind of a good citizen, not one that could abide to hear of laws, or of equal liberty. Al thefe therfore, who had been employed in any ministry or fervice about the King even they also who had been used in the least embassages that were, had commandment to depart out of Macedony and to go into Italy: and look who obeyed not this edict, were threatned with death. Unto Macedony he gave laws, with fuch diligent care and good regard, as if he had reckoned them not for enemies vanquished, but for allies of good desert: such i laws (flay) as the very practife and tryal of long time (the only corrector of all flatutes) was not able upon that experience, to check and control,

After these serious affairs were finished, he exhibited with great furniture and preparation, a folemnity of game and disport at Amphibalia, which long before he had intended, and for the intimation where he had both tent out his messengers to the States of Asaand to the KK, and alfo limbelfin his circuirand elitation of the Grecian Ciries, had given warning to the great men and principal citizens. And thither repaired out of all parts of the world, a number of cumning, dextrous; and artificial actors, that made profession of such plaies and passimes; besides a fort of wreftlers; champions, and brave hories of the best kind & breed. Also divers embassages with their beatts for factifices, and what foever elle was ultially done of custome, at the great and folemngs-M mings in Greece. Thus it came to pass, that men admired not only his magnificence, but his wiledonie alle in exhibiting their fhews and fights, wherin the Romans at that time were altogether rude and ignorant, Moreover, he feafted and banketted the Emball, in the fame fumptuous manner and respective consideration. And this (by report) was an apophthegm and common saying of his, That notic could make feafis and fer forth plaies better than he who had the skill to win a field. Having reptelenred these foleminities of all forts, and bellowed all the braien shields on thipboord; all other armor and weapons of fundry kinds, he piled upon a mighty heap, and after his praiers made to Mars, Minerva dame Lua, and other Gods and Goddefles unto whom of right and duty appentained to confecrate and dedicate the spoils of enemies; himself the General with his own hands per ander a burning torch, and kindled the fire, and after him all the marfhal-colonels flan- N ding round about cast every man his fire brand, and fer all a burning. This was a thing noted in that great affembly of Europe & Aja, where there was fuch a confluence of people from all parts, as well to termy their joy in his behalf as to be the thewe and disports in that meeting. I fay, offor great armies of lea-fer rices and land-fouldiers, there was that plenty of all things and cheaputs of victivals, that Ampliar the General, of that exceeding flore and abundance, gave much away freely to privat perfons, forelites and nations; not only for their prefent tile, but allo to cary home wichtebem into their coupities, And illis multitude there affembled took nor more pleasure either with them into their countries. And this multitude there aftembled, took not more pleasure experimentally the highest places acted, of feeing men practice fears of bodily through and addivity, or the thoughing of horiests the face, and river any themse the highest countries to be ken; namely, of stating, and painted tables, of the cloth of time, of welles in good and flowers, in the countries and convolved any good and flowers to the countries of the highest and convolved the troise that he kinds placed of * Missandria was reptembled in the will be the highest and countries and convolved the highest and countries are the statement of the first and countries and convolved the highest and countries are the statement of the first and countries.

'A Pella. And paffing by the City, he abode two daies at a place which they call Spelaum, and then be sent P. Nasica, and Q. Maximus his own son with part of the forces in an expedition, to give the wast unto those Illyrians, who had succoured Perfess in his wars, but he commanded them to meet him at Origins. Himself marching toward Epiras, at the fifteenth remove arrived at Pallaron. Not far from thence lay Anicim encamped : unto whom he dispatched his letters, to the end that he should not be troubled at those designs which were to be put in execution fight fying therein, that the Senat granted to the army the pillage of all the Cities of Epirm; which had revolted unto Perfess: which done, he suborned certain Centurions, and sent them, into all the Towns with instructions, to give out that his coming was to withdraw all the garrisons from thence, with an intent that the Epirots should enjoy their freedom as well as the Macedoniansa

R & fo he summoned out of every City ten of the chief to repair unto him. And when he had charged & commanded them to bring abroad into the market place all the gold and filver which they had, he fent out certain cohorts and companies of fouldiers to every of the faid Cities: they, who were affigned for the places farther remote went before them which were appointed to the neerer; and this was ordered fo, that upon the same day they should enter into them all at once. Now the Colonels and Centurions had their errand delivered them what to do. In the morning hetimes all the gold and filver was brought forth together accordingly, and that at the fourth hour of the day a fignal was given to the fouldiers to fall to ranfack and rifle the Cities, Wherein they found logreat flore of pillage, that every horiman had for his part * 400 Denarii, and the footmen * 12 lib to fit. 200 apiece, and a hundred and fifty thousand pols were led away into captivity. Then the walls find were rased of the said Cities thus spoiled, and those were to the number of seventy. All the booty and prizes were fold, and out of that mals of money were the fouldiers paid. From thence Paulus went down to the Sea fide, unto Oricem, But the fouldiers minds were nothing fo well fatisfied as he supposed they had been, for discontented mightily they were and angry, that they had no share at all in the Kings pillage and treasure, as if they had made no war in Macedany. At Oricann he found those forces which he had sent under the conduct of S. Nasica and Maximus his son; there he shipped his whole army, and sailed over into Italy. In like manner a few daies after, Anicius, when the fession and general meeting of the other Epirots and Acarnanians was ended, heving given commandment, that their principal persons should follow him into Italy (the knowledge and deciding of whose causes he reserved and referred thither) himself attended the ships which the army had used in Macedony, and passed over likewise into Halr.

At what time as these affairs were thus managed in Macedony and Epirus, the Embassadors who had been fent with Attalus, to end the war between the Gauls and King Eumenes, arrived in Afia. A furcease of arms for the winter time, was agreed upon between both parties, during which celfation the Gauls departed home, and Eumenes was retired to Pergamus there to winter, where also he lay grievously fick. The spring was no sooner come, but the Gauls began to flix and look abroad: but by that time they were come as far as the Synada, Enmenes had affembled his forces from all parts to Sardis. There at Synada, the Romans parled with Salovittins the General of the Gauls; Attalas also went with them : but shought good it was not, that he should enter within the Gauls camp, for fear of flirring coals in heat of argument, and raising choler of the one side or E other, So P. Licinius communed with the Duke of the Gauls aforfaid : and when he had done he brought word back, that the more he was entreated, the worfe he was and less tractable ; infomuch as it might feem a wonder, that the words of the Roman Embaffadors were so powerful and effectual with Antiochus and Prolomens (two mighty and puissant Kings) as to make peace so presently between them, fince they prevailed so little or nothing at all among the Gauls. To return again to Rome. First, the two captive Kings, Perfew and Gensius were sent thither, and committed there to ward they and their children after them the multimide besides of priloners, then consequently those Macedonians, as also the other chief peers of Greece, who were warned to repair unto Rome. For not they only were furmioned to make apparence, there, who had been feen present in place, but also all those were sent for by letters missive eggemprofily, who . F werehnt reported to have been with the Kings. Then Paulas himself a few dates after embarked in a thip of the Kings, a Galeace of a mighty higners, making way with finteen hanks and rowes, of oarstoa fide, and she fame fet out and adorted with the Macedonian spoils, not only of braves. gorgeous armour, but also of rich hangings uissue, & cloth, of gold our of the Kings wardsobersaine up the Tyber against the stream where great numbers of people went forth to greet him, and filled the banks on both fides of the river. These words set them agog; and when Tib. Sempronius a Tribune of the Commons read out and published the foresaid bill in the Capitol, and that by permission of law any private person might have spoken thereto, and no man came forth, as being a matter whereof no doub; & question was to be made: then Servine Galba suddainly stept forth, and required of the Tribune. That (forasmuch as it was so far forth dayes, as being the eight hour thereof, so that he had not time enough to declare and shew at large, what allegations he had why they should not grant L. But when the Tribune willed him again to speak his mind that day, if he had ought to fay; he made a speech, and with his long oration held the court until it was within night: putting them in mind and alledging, "How precisely and rigorously he had ecexacted at their hands all military duties; how he had imposed upon the souldiers more painful "and dangerous labour than need was: but contrary-wife in dealing rewards and bellowing ho-" nourable recompences for good fervice, he was over-straight-laced & too short in every point: "and verily fouldiery and warfare, it it continued fill under fuch Captains, will be more hard, tra-"vollome, and rough to fouldiers and warriors: but when all is done and victory obtained, rewar-"ded it shall be with bare poverty and neglect of honour. The fouldiers animated and induced with these perilous words, reforted the day following in fo great multitudes, and peffered the whole Capitol fo full, as none but they could come in togive their voice. The first tribes that were called in, clearly cassed the grace : which when the principal and chief men of the City faw they ran all into the Capitol with open mouth crying one upon this indignity offered. Is there any one at Rome but Perfeusagain Ithat would not have a triumph over the Macedonians? & are you not ready to pull fuch a one in pieces with those very hands, wher with you vanquished the Macedonians? He, who so ever he is, that impeacheth you for entring into the City in triumph, trust me truly, would have debarred you of victory if it had bin in his power, Lo how fouly are ye deceived (fouldiers) and far out of the way, if ye think that the triumph is the honor only of the General, and not of the fouldiers likewife, and confequently of the whole people of Rome. This is not Paulus his cale alone. Many others likewife there have been, who when they could not obtain triumph at the hands of the Senate, triumphed nevertheless upon the Albane. mountain. As impossible it is for any man to bereave L. Paulus of the honor due for the finishing of the Macedonian war, as it was to disappoint C. Luct arius of his glory for ending the first Pnnick war, P. refemble L. Paulus, in a City fo unchankful, nay, to spiteful and mulicious to all good men ? Say 19 of there were no question at all of infamy and objodity, but of honor only and reputation, tell me es (I beseech you) is there any triumph that comprises not the glory also of the Roman name? So of many triumphs over the Gauls to many again over the Spaniards, and so many over the Carthan es ginians, are they reputed and called the triumphis of the Captains alone, and not likewife of the se people of Rome? And like as we say, that we triumphed not over Pyrrbu only, nor over Annias ballout over the Epirots likewise and the Carthaginians: even so neither M. Cartan alone, nor es P. Cornelius, but the Romans also have triumphed. True it is, and I must needs say, that the sonl-« diers have a proper interest and part by themselves, in that they alone (dight with branches and chaplets of laurel, and every one bravely to be feen and adorned, with the gifts that have been a given them) relound to Triumphe, to Triumphe, and as they pass along the City sing and chant the f co praises of themselves and of their Captain-Generals, And if it fortune at any time that the souldiers be not brought home out of the province to the triumph, they grumble & are discontence ted: & vet notwithstanding, absent though they be, they think it is their due; and so long as their .. General and leader triumpheth, they triumph allo, because the victory was atchieved by the ce fixength of their arms, Good fouldiers, it a man should ask you, for what intent you were reconand the war brought to an end, ye had not prefently your congy of discharge? moreover, to what purpose ye came by com-, panies and iquadrons under your enligns and colors? for what canfe ye flay and remain here and go not every man his waies to his own home? what answer would ye make elfe, but. That ye ego not every man ms water to ms own months. The word he victory and are conquerous, K would be feen in triumph? Octavius, judg ye in your own conceit that you are more worthy of a triumph than I? They would no doubt come down each one out of his chariot and yeeld him their placeyea, and for very shame deliver up all their ensigns and or-naments unto him. And you Quirites, had you rather see Gentum than Persem led intriumph? would you wish indeed to triumph for an accidental appendant only of the war, rather than for the main substance of the war? Shall the legions coming out of Sclavonia, and the mariners at sea. enter the City crowned with laurel garlands; and the legions out of Macedony, being denied their own triumph stand still and behold others to triumph? Moreover, what shall become of that rich booty? what shall be done with the spoils of that great and wealthy victory? where shall be bestowed and laid up so many thousand corslets and armors plucked from the bodies of enemies slain? Shall they be sent back again into Macedom? Those costly images of gold, of marble, of ivorysthose goodly fair pictures; those pretions clothes and hangings of purple, scarlet, and tiffue; that mighty quantity of gold and filver wrought into veffels chafed and engraven; that buge mass of the Kings mony and coin, what shall we do with it? What? shall it be carried all by M "night as floln goods into the publick treasury and City Chamber? The goodlieft fight of all the rest; what say you to it? A most noble & puissant King is taken prisoner; where shall he be shewed to the people of Rome his conqueror? What running, what concourfe there was of people to fee K. Syphan captive (& yet he was but an acceffary to the Funick war) most of us do well remember Shall K. Perseus then, a prisoner and captive; shall Philip and Alexander his sons, (persons of (logrest name) be hidden and kept from the fight and eyes of the City: And there were no more " but L. To him then, who (at what time as the lot of that province fell unto him, and "when he departed on his voiage from Rome) had all our hearts to prefage victory and triumph, " shall we now deny triumph when he hash the victory? And verily in so doing, we shall not only "defraud men, but rob the gods also of their honor; for due it is to the very gods also, and notto " menalone. Have not your ancestors ever used to enterprise all great affairs in the name of the egodsfirst, & therin alfo to end last? The Cof, or Pretor, when he is to take his journy into his pro-"vince, or to levy war, with his Lictors before him clad in their coats of arms, is ever wont to make "his solemn vows in the Capitol: after he hath acquit himself of his charge and obtained victory, "when as he triumpheth, he transferreth in pomp the rich presents of the people of Rome so well "deserved and offereth them to the same gods in the said Capitol, unto whom there first he pronounced his vows. And the beafts for factifice going before the pomp of triumphare not the leaft of er part of this folemnity: that it may appear, how the General in his return is mindful of the gods, & erendreth thanks unto them for the happy managing of the affairs of Commonweal. As for those beafts for facrifice which he hath appointed to be shewed in the pomp of triumph, flay them? e neither makes it matter whose hand doth itssome kil one & some another, but those sacred viands " of the Senat, which are not to be eaten in any privat house, nor in publick place unhallowed;

Valerius Antias teporteth. That the fum of all the gold and filver taken in pillage and carried in [] is supplied n the pomp of this triumph, amounted to the worth of 20 millions of Sefferces. Which mass, no our of Plutarth, Somedonbt, arifeth much greater by the proportion of the number of wains, and the poiles both of what wanteth gold and filver by the same author set down in general sums. And as some have recorded he either besides immespent in the war next before, or else scattered and loft in his flight when he made hatt to Samo- diatly after thrace, as much again as that came to. And the more wonder it was, that fo might va mais of this Oration, money had beengathered and heaped up within thirty years after the war between Philip and the of the deferipe Romans, raifed part out of the iffue and incomb of his metal mines, and part out of other profits, tion of Paulus and tributs. Thus Philip very bare of money, and Perfew contrary-wife exceeding rich, began to his triumph, make war with the Romans. Last of all, Paulus himself fode in his charios, carrying a great port and majeffy with him, both for his comely and personable body, and also for his reverent old age.

B. After his charior, among other honorable personages rode his two sons, Q. Maximus and P. Scipio. Thenfollowed the horsemen by troops; and the sootmen by their cohorts and companies; every one keeping their ranks full decently. The footmen had given them a hundred Sefterces speece, the Centurions double, and the horsemen trible so much, And it is thought that he means to have given the footmen asmuch as the most, and to the rest in proportion, in case they either had not denied his honour by their voices, or if in token of thankfulness and joy, whey had but willingly and cheeffully shouled when this fully which they received was proviousled and related unto them. And not Perfest alone (led is he was through the chemies City in chains before the triumphant chariot of the conqueror) but also Paulin Bimfelf the conqueror glittering to glorion fly in his cloth of gold and coffly purple, was a mirrot to the word in those few daies, of the trans-Erory and mutable flate of mans life. The Kings "treasure I seized upon: the King in person (as if the very Gods themselves had delivered and 46 put him into my hands) I took prisoner, with his sons in the Temple of the Samothracians, But "then my heart missave me, and even then I suspected the surpassing favour of my good fortune: "then cast I doubts, and began to fear the dangers at fea, having so mighty a mais of the Kines "treasure to transport, and my victorious army to reconduct back into Italy, But seeing all things 6 fall out to hearts defire, a prosperous voiage, a safe arival, and whatsoever I could pray for at the "Gods hands; this I wished in my heart, (as knowing full well the wonted manner of fortune, when the is at the highest pitch, to turn back again and come as fast down) that mine own K " house, rather than the Common-weal, might seel that change and alteration whensoever it ac came. And therefore I hope that this to notable a calamity of mine own, shall excuse the City for having any other misfortune, fince that my triumph (as it were to check and mock the "changes of this world) hath faln fo just between the funerals of my two fons. See how I and " Perfeus are represented above all others for two notable examples of the frail and unstable con-"dition of man. Lo how he, who being a prisoner himself, saw his sons likewise led captives before "his face, hath them yet living found and fafe; and I, who have triumphed over him, came from "the burial of one of my fons to ride in my chariot up to the Capitol, and from thence descen-"ded again to find the other lying at point of death: neither is there of all that fair issue that I "had, one left to bear the name of L. Paulus Emplius. For two of them the house of the Cornelis L. and the Fabii have, unto whom I gave them in adoption, as out of a great race and breed of " children: fo as now, in the family of Paulus there is not one left but himself. Howbeit for this er calamity and ruin of my house, your felicity and the happy estate of the City is a great comfore. 4° and confolation again. These words delivered with such a magnanimity, troubled the spirits of the auditors, and aftonied them more, than if he had lamentably moned himfelf unto them with piteous tears, for his childless estate and desolat condition.

C.Offavius solemnized his naval triumph over King Perseus the first day of December in which folemnity, he neither had prisoners led in shew, nor spoils carried in pomp, He gave to his mariners and failers seventy and five Denaritapeace; to every pilot double, and to the ship-masters four times as much. After this the Senat affembled, and the LL, ordained, That Q. Caffins should M. lead King Perseus with his for Alexander, together with his train that accompanied him, as also bring all his money and goods, filver, or what moveables and furniture foever he had to Albas thereto be kept in fure cuftody. Bin the Kings fon of Thrace, with the hoftages was fent to Carfeoli, there to lie in fafe ward. As for the reft of the captives who had been led in triumph, thought good it was they should be clapt up fast in prison.

Some few dayes after these things, there arrived Embassadors from Cory, King of the Thracians, bringing with them money for thosenfome of his fon and the other hoftages. Into the Senat they were brought; where, by way of preamble they laid this for the ground of their speech, That Care had not fided with King Parfew in the war, upon his own motive and accord, but was compelled to give hoftages: then they befought the LL, of the Senate to infer them to be redeemed at N what price foever they would let down, were it never fo high. Linto whom this answer was returned by authority of the Senat, " That the people of Rome bare well in mind the amity which " they had with Corps, with this progenitors, and the whole nation of the Thracians. As for the giving of the hoftages, is was rather an evidence to prove, than an argument to excufe their telepals and fault: confidering that when Perfess was quiet, the Thracian nation flood inno is fear and ass of him, much leffether, when as he was troubled and occupied in war with the Ro-"mans. Howbeit although Cotys preferred the favour of Penfens before the friendship of the peoes ple of Romes, yet they would confider of the matter, and respect more his quality and what was " meet for his effate, than his defert and what he was worthy, to have and therefore they would " release his son and the hoffages, and send shem home again. As, for the people of Rome, their mand ner is to beflow their favours and benefits freely without regard of recompense the worth and sellimation whereof they had rather leaveto the confideration and minds of the receivers, than " require and demand the same presently. So these were Embassadours nominated to reconduct the hoftages into Thrace to wit, T. Quintins Flominius, C. Licinius Dermand M. Caninius Rabilus. And to those Thracian Embaliadours were given by way of preferes 2000 affer apeece. L. Anicias triumphed over the triumphed over the tr L. Anicke triumpiect over name of the state otherwise countervailed in fubitance the former triumph. The General himself Ancies was inforior to Æmilim both in nobility and also in quality of person: and setting together their places upon the 12 of of command, the one being but Pretor, and the other Conful; neither was Gentine equal to Per. Fibring, feur nor the Illyrians to the Macedonians: Spoil for spoil, money for money gitts for gifts, there was no proportion nor comparison between them. And therefore as that fresh late triumph was

B more resplendent and glorious than this, so considered in it self without other respect, it was not to be found fault withal and despised. Anicins within few daies had vanquished and throughly tamed the nation of the Illyrians; both by Sea and Land proud and mighty, bearing themselves four and bold for their firong and fenced fores. The King he took prisoner and those of the Kings race and roial blood. He shewed in triumph many field-enfigns, besides other poils and movedblelgoods of the King: Likewise of gold seven and twenty pound weight, and of filver nineteers; befides 2000 Denatii, and a hundred and twenty thouland peeces of Illytian filver in coin; Before his chariot were led King Gentins with his wife and children; Caravanting alfo the Kings brother. and certain noblemen of Illyricum. Out of the pillage he gave unto his footmen 45 Denahii abeece. to every Centurion a double proportion, and unto the horsemen a triple. To the allies of the Lau C tine nation he allowed asmuch as to citizens; the sailers and mariners he made coul with the footmen. Herein he furmounted the triumph of Emplius, for that his fouldiers followed after his triumphant chariot more jocund and merry, and the General was praised and extolled in many a dirry and ballad. Antiac writeth, That of his booty there was railed as much money as came to twenty millions of Sestertii, over and above the gold and silver that went into the common treasury, But because I could not see how possibly such a sum should bemade, I have set down mine author for the thing, now, chuse you whether you will believe him, King Gentini with his wife, children, and brother, was by order from the Senat led to Spoletiam, there to be kept in ward : all the captives besides were at Rome cast into prison, and there lay. But when the Sholes tins refused to take the charge and custody of him and the rest, these Princes were translated from thence to Igiturvium. There remained besides of the Illyrian prizes two hundred and twenty barks, which being taken from King Gentiut, Q. Caffinsby the ordinance of the Senat gave and distributed among the citizens of Corphy, Apollogia, and Dyrrhachium.

The Consuls that year after they had only wasted the tetritories of the Ligurians, because they

He entredime the City with a great train attending up. on him; from the gate he went directly to the common place and the tribunal of Q. Calling the Pretor. And when there was agreat concourse of people about him from all parts; he said that his coming was to worthip the Gods which are the presidents of the City of Rome, as allo to sathis the people of Rome, and withal to thew his own joy and to with their sfor their happy vicory over the two Kings Perfeus and Gentius, and for that by fubding the Macedonians and Illy-thats, they had enlarged their fiegnosy and cominion. And when the Preror made an offer to call F a Senat for him evenehat prefene day if he would so himself the defired rivo daies respit to fee the Cornelise as Scipiothe treasurer was appointed to go about with him and shew him all: who also had been fencastaras to Capua forto meet him upon the way: also for him and his train about him, there was a sufficient house taken up, where he was kindly and liberally intertained. The third day after he came into the Senat, where after he had congratulated in their behalf for their late victory, he recounted his own demerits and good deferts during the war t and then requested, that he might have leave to pay his vows and namely, to factifice at Rome in the capitol, ten head of spectar beatls, and one at Prenefic to Portune. For that he faid those vows we mande for the victory of the people of Rome. Also that the league and alliance with him might be renued; liem that the Cland won by conquest from King Amiachus, which being not by the people of Rome given unto any, the Gauls notwithfianding held in possession, might be conveied unto him by a deed of gift. Lak of ell, he recommended his son Nicowedes to the Senat, He found much favor among all them. who had been Generals of armies in Magadony. And therefore he obtained directly all other fuils that he made: only as touching the faid lands, this answer he had. That they would fend certain commissioners to see and view the thing. At Rome likewise when he entred the Councel-house, he stooped down and kissed the very door sill, calling the Senators Gods, his Saviors, yea, and to have nied other speeches not so honorable to the hearers, as base and unfitting his own person. When he had to journed in and about the City not above thirty daies, he took his leave and departed into his own Realm.

Rom the five and for b book forward, all the rest of Livy (to the great main and blemifb of the Latine tongue, and no fmail grief of tharmed men) is loft, even 100 books wanting five, like as those ten between the tenth and one and twentieth books, commonly called the second Decadi Foras is a appearet by L. But af it be true that Francis Petrarch faith, Levy wrote in all 143 and at Charles Sigonius probably conjecturath, the 36 and 37 Breviaries of L. Florus be waning of this later minuter. How all these complete books of T. Livius Bould misury, it is me executive known. Some hope there eisthat they are hut mis caft and laid out of the way hat like as wishin these hundred years some fragments of the story were descoupied to in Mogunce: and the last five books war axians, found by Simon Gringus in the Library of a monastery over-against the Gity of Worms, and dedicated by Erasmus of Rotterdam unto Charles the fon of William Lord Montjoy, is the reign of Henry the eight of famous memory K. of England, e. formare notto despair of the reft. Of the XLVI, Book, Umenes came towards Rome, Now because in the Macedonian war he had carried himself indifferent between Perseus and the Romans, there passed a law in general terms, That no Kine might repair to Rome; to the end, that if he were excluded, he should not be reputed an enemy; nor if he were admitted, acquit and cleered of all fault. Cl. Marcellus the Conful fubdued the Gauls inhabiting the Alps, and C. Sulpitius Gallus the Ligurians. The Embassadors of King Prufias complained of Eumenes, for that he invaded and wasted their borders; and they informed befides that he had confirred with Antiochus against the people of Rome. At the earnest fuit and entreaty of the Rhodians, a league was contracted with them. The Cenfors took a review and survey of the City. wherein were enrolled and selfed 327022 citizens of Rome. M. Emylius Lepidus was elected pre lident of the Senat. Ptolomans the King of the Egyptians, was by his jonger brother expelled out of his realm, but by the means of Embassadors (fent from Rome) he was restored to his Kingdom. Upon the death of Ariarathes King of Cappadocia, his fon Ariarathes came to the crown and by entercourfe and mediation of Embassadors, renewed amity with the people of Rome. This book containeth besides, the wars against the Ligurians, Corsians, and Lustanians, fought with varsable fortune : the troubles also in Syria after the death of Antiochus, who left behind him Antiochus his fon, a very child. The wone Prince (together with his quardian I ylias) Demetrius the fon of Seleucus (who hadebeen fent in hoflage to Rome) murdred privily, because he was not set at large and dismissed by the Romans: and so himfelf entred upon the Kingdom, L. Emylius Paulus who had conquered Perfeus, departed this life; whole incorruption and abstinence from the publick treasure was such, that notwithstanding he had brought both out of Spain and Macedony fo great store of wealth and riches, yet when his distincte prized and fold, there would be hardly raised thereof sufficient to repay his wife her downy. The Poppitine marishes were drawn drie by Cor, Cethegus the Conful (unto whom shat charge was by lot faln) and the Same tarned into firm ground.

Of the XLVII. Book.

Nens Tremellius a Tribune of the Commons had a fine fet on his head, for that he had contended Sin a wrongful canfe with M. Emylius Lepidus the foveraign Pontifie. The power and authority of the clergie Magistrats, was greater and mightier than before. A law was enabled as conching inordinate fuit for offices. In the survey of the City there were taxed in the subsidy book 228314 Roman citizens, L. Emylius Lepidus was chosen again president of the Senat, Between the two brethren Ptolomees, who were at variance, there taffed this accord and agreement, That the one should reign in Egypt and the other in Cyrenz. Ariarathus King of Cappadocia, by the politick plot and forcible power of Demetrius King of Syria dispossessed of his Kingdom, was bythe Senat fet into it again. Certain Embassadors were sent as delegats from the Senas to determine of the litigious ground between Ma-Sanissa and the Carthagintans, C. Martius the Conful fought against the Dalmatians, at the first unforematly, but afterwards atchieved the victory. The occasion of the war with them was this; for that they had made wast upon the Illyrians, who were allies of the people of Rome. The same nation Corne-lius Nasica the Consul brought in subjection, Q. Opimius the Consul subdued the Ligarians beyond the Alps, who had spoiled Autipolis and Nicza, two Towns belonging to the seignory of the Massilians. Moreover here are contained the adventures of many Captains in Spain, with no good success. In the 598 year from the foundation of the City, the Confuls fo foon as the affembly for election was past and other Confuls chosen for the year following, began their office. The cause of this alteration was because the Spaniards were entred into rebellion. The Emhass aforesaid who had been sent to take up and decide the controver spetween Masanilla and the Carthaginians, made report, That they had found great fore of hip-timber and other matters for a navy at Carthage, Certain Pretors acculed by the provinces for avarice, were condemned.

Of the XLVIII. Book,

The Censorstook a review and tax of the city, wherein were reskoned three hundred four and twenty thousand polls of citizens. The canses of a shird Paintic war be here recorded, Upon a report that the wind polls of citizens. The canses of the Garthagians, conducted by At-Chobazzames the nepher of Syphian, M. Senat a check and rebuke, for that against the covenants of the loaguesthey maint ained forces, and were provided of timber and other fuff for a navy, they were willing to conclude a poace between Majaniffa and them; fo as Masanisia (hould forgo and part with the land in question. But Gilgo the fon of Amilcat, about and leditions man, who then was foveraign Magistrate (not withstanding their Sexas promiled to be ruled by the award of the (aid Embassadors) incited them so by his persmasive remonstrances to war upon the Romans, that the Embaffadors made fth fi to flee and fave them felves, or elfe ther had come to a mischief. When they related these news at Rome, the Senat already set and bent against the Carthaginians, were now by his words provoked much more. M. Portius Cato performed the funerals of his fon, deceased in his Pretorship, with exceeding small charges, according to his ability, for he was put poor. One Audricus, who fourly made the world believe, that he was the fon of Perseus the King of Macedony, was fent to Rome, M. Emylius Lepidus, now fix times chosen President of the Senat by the Cenfors, gave hu fon in freight charge before he died, to carry him forth to burial in a couch without linnen clothes and the purple pall, and not to bestom in other obsequies above one denier ; saying, that the funerals of the greatest and best personages are wont to be encobled and honoured with the shews of images and titles, and not with simptuous expenses. An inquisition there was about the practise of possoning and lorcery. Publilia and Licinia who were endited for making away their husbands, put in sureties before the Pretor, to be bound in goods, lands, and body for them, and after judicial process passed and their caule heard, by a decree of their kinsfolk suffered death. Guluffa the fon of Malaniffa gave intelligence. that at Catthage there was mustering and levying of souldiers, rigging and providing of a fleet, all preparations no doubt for war : and Publicus Cornelius Nafica replied again, that not hing was to cedone inconfideratly, without advise. Thought good it was to sendien Embassadors, for to see the truth of all, and upon their knowledg to certify, L. Licinius Lucullus and A. Posthumius Albinus the Confuls, when they took musters with severity and rigour, and would not for favour spare any one, but prest all, were committed by the Tribuns of the commons, who for their friends could obtain at their hands no release and immunity of fouldiery. By occasion of the wars in Spain, which many times had been untowardly and unfortunatly managed, when the Gity of Rome was so dismaied and dannted that there could not be found any one who would so much as accept of a martial Tribunsbip, or was willing to go in quality of Lieutenant; P. Cornelius Emylianus stepped forth, made offer and professed, that he would undertake any kind of military service what sever should be laid upon him: and by bis own example storred up all the restrothe love of warfine. L. Lucullus the Consul, when Claudius Marcellus (after whom be succeeded) was thought to have quieted all the states and nations of Celtiberia, Subdued the Vacceans, Camabrians, and other regions and nations as yet unknown in Spain. P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus Emylianus, the fonof L. Paulus, and the nephew of Africanus by adoption, being there amartial Colonel, flew a Barbarian challenger that defied him. But in the winning of the City Intercaria, he adventured a wore dangerous enterprise : For he was the first of all other that scaled and mounted over the wall, Setvius Sulpitius Galba the Preter sped but badly in a battail ugainst the Portugals. When as the Embaffadore were returned out of Africk, together with the Carthaginian Orators, and Gulusia the son of Malanissa, bringing word, That they found at Carthage both an army and also an armado; thought good it was, to put to question and debate the matter in the Senat : where Cato and other principal Senators were of opinion and gave advises to transport an army presently into Africk: but because C. Nasica opined and faid, That he faw as yet no just and sufficient cause of war, agreed it was to forbear all hostility and force of arms, in cale the Carthaginians would burn their navy and discharge their army if not, then agreed it was that the Corfuls next following in place of government should propose as touching the Punick war. When the Theatre was built, which by the Consors had been put forth to no kneen to frame, and fet up at a price, through the means of Pub, Cornelius Nafica, who inferred, that it was a peece of work unprofitable, yea, and hurtful to the manners generally of the citizens; by vertue of an act of Senat demolished it was and pulled down; so at the people for along time stood ontheir feet to behold the publick plaies. The Carthaginians at that time took arms contrary to the league, and warred upon Malaniffa. But vanquified they were in field by him (who notwithfar ding he now was four foreyear old and twelve, yet he uf diotast his meat simply without any dainty sauce yea, and to chew his bare broad fills; and over and besides they deserved to draw upon their head the Roman wir.

Of the XLIX, Book,

He beginning of the third Punick war, in the fix hundreth and one year from the Cities foundation on, which within 5 years after it began, came to a full and finall end. Much dever fity there was in opinion between M. Porcius Cato whom they reputed for the wifelt, and Scipio Nafica, who by the Senat was judged the best and honestest man in the City. Cato was altogether for the wars, and advised to defiroy Carthage quite : Nafica contrarywife diffmaded what he could. Neverthelefs, in the end orderned it was. That because against covenant and according kept a navy at sea, and had led forth an army out of their borders: also for that they entred into arms and levied war upon Malanilla, a friend and confederat to the people of Rome, andreceived not into their Town, Guluffa his for mho was in the company of the Roman Embassadours; war should be proclaimed against them. But before that any forces were embarked and had taken the fea, the Embassadors of Unica repaired to Rome, reclding themselves and all that they had. That embassage, as a special presage to the issue and event of the war, was acceptable and pleasing to the Lords of the Senat, but heavy and grievous to the Carthaginians. In Terentum [a place it was in Campus Martius, wherepon the postimes Terentins took their name] were plates exhibited to Father Dis the infernal God, according to the direction of the books of Sibylla. Thefe had been let out one hundred years before in the first Punich war, and in the five hundreth year and one, after the City was founded. Thirty Embassadors came to Rome, by whom the Carthaginians presented their Submission. But the sentence of Cato imported and prevailed, to hold fill their former determination. and that the Consuls with all speed should set forward on their journey to the war. Who having passed the less and arrived in Affick, received of them three hundred hoftages, whom they had required and demanded; and also took into their hands all their armor and weapons, and what farniture of war so yer they found at Carthage. They proceeded moreover after all this to command them by warrant and authorsey from the LL of the Senat to build them a new Town for to inhabit in some other place. So that it were ten miles at least remote from the Sea: by which indignity offered, they provoked the Carthaginians to rile and take arms again. L. Martius and M. Manilius the Confuls, began to beliege and all aule Carthage: during which siege and asfault, it fortuned that two Colonels unadvisedly adventured to break into the City with their cohorts, at one part thereof where the walls were neglected, and when by the Townsmen they were sore beaten and killed, by the means of Scipio Affricanus they were rescued: by whom also a certain sconce and fort of the Romans, which the enemies by night all ailed, with the help of a few horlemen was delivered. Moreover, he saved the camp, against which the Carthagenianr sallied forth of their City to give the assault at once upon it with all their forces; by which service he above the rest won great honor. Over and besides, when as the Consul (for the other was gone to Rome to hold the election of Magistrats) seeing the siege and assault of Carthage took no better effect, minded to lead the army against Aldrubal, who with another power of menk, pi the narrow streights of a certain passage, he counselled the said Cos. first, not to give battel in a place of such disadvantage; but afterwards overweighed and bern down by the opinions of the greater number (who envied as well his wifedom as vertue) he also entred into the same streights. And when the Roman army, according as he foretold, was discomfitted and put to flight, and two cohorts befor round and invested by the enemies, he with certain small cornets of horse returned into those streights, rescued them, and brought them away in safety. Which valour of his, even Cato, (a man otherwise more ready of his tongue to find faults) so recommended in the tour of ma seven setting a man was any and faid, " That all there ft who were emploied in the wars of Affrick, ferved as shadows and dead men, but Cato had true orgour and spirit indeed. The people of * He alludedi Rome besides cast such a favour and good liking to him, that at the next election, most of the tribes verse of times, pricked him for to be Consul, notwithstanding he was by law under age. When L. Scribonius ad ribune "10 résyvof the Commons had promulged a law, That all the Portugals (who according to covenant and composition of the sion, yeeld-diothe people of Rome, and yet by S. Galba were fold in France) should be restored to their oxias diarroi, freedom; M. Cato most earnestly pleaded in the behalf of that law, and maintained it. His Oration is extant to be feen, included within his Annals. Q. Fulvius Nobiliot, albeit he was by him faken up and well checked in the Senat, answered in the behalf of Galba. Tea, and Galba also, seeing himself at the point to be condemned, took in his arms and embreced his own two fons ; being "Prætextati, and a fon C. Sulpitius whole Guardian he was and mad: Inch piteous and rufal mone, all the while he spake in his own saufe, shat the forefaid law was revoked and cancelled. Three Orations of his there are to be feen; two against Libo a Tribune of the Commons and his proposed laws, as touching the Portugals; and one against L.Cornelius Cethegus, in which he confession and avoweth the killing of the Portugals encamped neer unto him : for that he knew certainly that they after their manner had facrificed an horse and a

and the most abject lowest condition, who made the world believe that be was King Perseus his son, and thereupon changed his name and was called Philip, having made an escape and fled secretly from Rome

(whither Demetrius King of Spria had fent him in regard of this his notorious lie) had many men come flocking unto him, embracing a forged and counterfeit fable of hie, as if it had been a true fame and report: by which means he gathered an army together, and either with the good will of the inhabit ants, or by force of arms, seized all Macedony and held it in his hands. Now had he devised and framed the pageant in this wife, That Perseus the King had begotten him (forfooth) of a concubine: that he was

Moreover, that there was a little book given to my supposed mother, sealed with the sign manual of King

Perseus which she was to deliver unto me when I came once to ripe age, and to be t4 years old: charging her most streightly of all loves, to conceal the whole matter until that time were come: and when I was grown to that age aforefaid, then the book was given me, wherin mention was made of two chefts of trea-

Jure lest for me by my father. Then the woman, who knew full well that I was no child of hers, but only so laid great wait upon me to depart out of those quarters before that Eumenes, a professed enemy to Pet-letts, came to the knowledg thereof, for fear to be murdered. In which respect I being affrighted and hoping withal to find some aid at the hands of Demetrius, went into Syria; and there first I took heart unto me, and dared openly to profels who I was, and never before. [Thus much of Andrikus this counterfet

Hessaly at what time as the for said counterfet Philip would have invaded and kept it by force of arms, was by the means of the Roman Embas adors, together with the aid of the Achaans defended. Prulias King of Bithynia, a favourer of the basest persons and lewdest vices, was by his own son Nicomedes murdered with the help of Attalus King of Pergamus, Another son he had, who in stead of the upper row and course of distinct teeth, is reported to have had one entire bone for all, growing out at his gums. When the Komans had fent their Embas adors to conclude a peace between Nicomedes and Prulias; of which Embassadors, the one had his head full of many scars, the other was troubled with the gour in the feet, and the third reputed but blockish of spirit by nature, and none of the wifest; Cato Said, That there was an embassage head-less, foot-less, and heart-less. In Syria, which at that time had for their King, one indeed of the line and race of Perieus K. of Macedony, but another Prulias up and down for comardife, idlenes, and base mind; it so fell out, that whiles he haunted taverns, stews, and brothelhouses, and lay there altogether, Ammonius swaid the Scepter and raigned as King : by whose practise the Kings friends, also Laodice the Queen, and Antigonus the fon of Demetrius came to their end and were killed. Malavisla King of Numidia, a man above four score and ten years old, a famous Prince and every way excellent, yeelded to nature and died. Among other youthful parts which he performed to his dying day, this is one, That in this old age of his he was folusty, that after the four score and fixth year of his life he got a boy. Among his three fons, Mycipla (the eldeft) Guluffa and Mavastabal, who also had knowledge in the Greek tongue, Publius Scipio Emylianus divided the administration of the Kingdom: for their father had left it in common for them all and had given order topart it at the difcretion of the Same Scipio. Likewise, he persuaded Phamias the commander under Himilco of the Carthazinian Cavalry, (a valiant warrior, and whom the Carthaginians emploied most of all others in service) to revolt with his men of arms and to turn Roman. Of those three Embassadors above said who were fent to Mafanista, Claudius Marcellusmas cast away in a tempest upon the leasand sivallowed up of the wives in a gust. The Carthaginians madered in their Councel-chamber Astrubal nephem of Masanista, and their Pretor for the time being, upon suspition of treason. This jealousy of theirs arose hereupon for that he was neer in kindred and blood to Gulusta, who friend dand succounsed the Romans. For where shall we find a man that is anarra roods, omnique ex parte beatus? And indeed, if we weigh the thing aright, as it was a profession by it self, and required a whole man: 10, many travelled therein alone, and they that performed well but it only, deserved high thanks and commendation. And to let many others pass, how worthily is T. Pomponius Articus praised by Cicero his friend, for digefting the head Magistrates of 700 years in one book? As for Verrius Flaccus, who lived in the time of Augustus Casar, he collected a catalogue and register of the chief Rulers of Rome, how they were cholen successively, and how they governed from time to time which as he caused to be cut and engraven in a marble, wall within the Capitol for a perpetualt memory to posterity; so, thereby he deserved also to havehis own statue exected near the Temple of Vesta, for an everlafting memoriall of fo great a benefit, But what is there fo durable, that time wasteth not? CHRONOLOGIE

HISTORY OF TITUS LIVIUS.

Compiled according to the Tables and Records of Verrius Flaces in the Capitoll, and fet out with most profitable Notes, shewing the variety and disagreement of Authors about the names of the Roman Confuls.

The causes of dissent and repugnance in Historiographers, as touching the computation and relating of the years from the foundation of the lity of Rome.

Inte we intend to fet forth a Kalender or Register of the Confuls mentioned in the History of Liviar, which by reason of uncertainty, obscurity, and discordance of the times, is so dark and intricate, that not only the learned and most experienced Historians of our age, but the best writers of the Roman story in ancient time very often complained thereof; we think it not impertinent to our purpose, briefly to fearch into the causes of this diffent : which being once known, we may follow that account of the times, which feemeth to accord best with the Historicall truth, and to be grounded upon the authority and testimony of the most authenticall and approved writers. For feeing that an History (as Cicero hath most truly said) is the witness of times; what is more unfitting for it, than to mils and want that which is the chiefest point therein, and without due and diligent reckoning made, to be ignorant what was first and what was last done? It seemeth therefore, that of this diversity in the account and computation of the Roman Confuls, there be three

The first is, for that the year in which the first Consuls entred into that Magistracy, is by the Roman Hilloriographe so, not after one fort but diverfly fet down. For Dionyfins (a most diligent writer of the Acts of Romans) in his first book, in the end of the fourth and beginning of the fifth, reporteth, that the KK, reigned 244 years: which also is collected out of the yearly computation gathered by Varro and approved by the authority of others. For Melfala reporteth, how upon the expulsion of the KK, which happed in the 244 year after the foundation of the City, the Romans were ruled under the yearly government of Confuls. To which opinion Livy also sub-Cribeth in the end of his first book, faying, that the regiment of KK, continued 244 years from the foundation of the City, unto the freedom and liberty thereof. But Eutropius in his first book writeth that the leven Kings reigned in Rome 243 years : which account agreeth with Sex. Ruffas in his abridgment. In which variety this is to be observed, that these two last named reckon the years only of every Kings raigh, and out of the whole and gross sum leave out the year of the interreign, which Diony sius, Livius, Messala, and the rest insert between, and that right truly and upon good reason: for after the death of Romalus, the interreign continued one year. Consider then and examine the thing diligently, and ye shall find, that in reckoning the years of every Kings reign in leverall, Eutropius and Sentus Ruffus both, attribute as many years to the Kings government, as Denis, Livy, and therest fo that this difference is not much. But othere there be(as Enfebius hath delivered in his Chronicles) who write that the KK reigned but 243 years, and take the interregency withall: whose judgment, Orofius, Iornandes, and Bede feem to follow. For Orofins in the fift chapter of his fecond book recordeth, that Brutus the Conful in that very year namely the 244, put his own fons to death. The Kings reigned not precifely fo many years just, but, for that some (and namely, Romulas) went over some months and dates, Dionyfius and Livius reckoned shem for a full year, and laid it to Tarquinius Prifcus: but the other above-named, together with Eulebius, left out those odd months and daies (because they made not up a compleat year) and affigned but only feven and thirty years to the reign of King Prisons. To this may be added another reason of the like nature : namely, that as divers authors have doubtfully reported the year, fothey are no more certain of the month and day on which the first Consuls began their government. For Platerch in his Problems writeth, that they entred upon the first day of January: but Macrobius in the first book of his Saturnalia and seventh chapter, seemeth to imply that they took their Consuls place the first of June, saying, (according to the opinion of others) That June took the name of Junius Brutus: for that in this month, and namely, upon the first day thereof (according to a vow whereto he was obliged by the banishment of Tarquin) he solemnized a sacrifice to the goddels Carnea upon mount Calius, Others again write, how this happed the 24 of February; grounding herein upon the old antiquities and records of stone, together with the testimony of Ovid, who in the second book of his

Some there are befides of opinion, that they cutted the first day of July: and of their mind seemeth Joachimus Perionius to be, in his third book of the Greek Magistrates. In this repugnancy therefore of opinions, very doubtfull it is which to follow. As for that of Plutarch, it hath long fince been clearly and learnedly confuted by two great and excellent clarks, Onuphrius Panvinius and Sigonius: fince it is plain that it was the fix hundred year from the foundation of the City, and not before, that the Confuls began their government the first of January. But in setting down the certain day, they themselves are not well agreed. For Sigonius after Marlianus inclineth this way and faith, That the first day of the Confuls government was the fix and twentieth day of May. But Panvinius thinketh that the first Confuls were created the 26 day of February, And this diverfity is found not only in the day when the first Consuls took their government, but also in the time after ensuing. What was the usuall day of any month whereon the Consuls were wont to begin their Magistracy, a man can hardly find any certainty before the fix hundred year from the Cities foundation. In the four and fortieth year verily after the Kings were exiled the first day of July, as Livy writeth, was the ordinary day for yearly Magistrates to take their place: but how many years following, that order continued, or at what time it was changed, he shewed not before he come to the three hundred and two year, and then he faith in his third book. That the thirteenth of May was the ordinary day for Magistrates to begin their government. Thus much at least wife we may collect by him (when he faith that this time was folemn) that he meant nor two or three years only, but many. For that is properly called folemn, which is by law usually obferved. Again, we read a little after the beginning of the fift book, that this time also was altered : for whereas the fift day of December was the usual time that Magittrates began to execute their office, he faith, that it was changed, in these words, The principall Nobles and Lords of the Senat, were it upon the default or the infortunity of their Generals (that to fiame ull an overthrow was received Jopined and advited, not to expect and thay for the ordinary time of the election, but prefently to create new military Tribunes in Confuls authority, who should enterinto their government the first day of Ostober. Sec. Which opinion of theirs imported; and the whose house accorded to it: whereupon the other Tribunes gainfaid it. But Sergius and Meginius withRood this AS of the Senit, and denied flatly to refign up their dignity before the eleventh of December, the ordinary day of taking their oath and beginning their Magistracy. And a little after, within one page, he sheweth that the usual day of entrance into government was altered from the eleventh of D_{ε} cember to the first of September, saying. When this speech was received with a generall appeaule of all men, and that the Nobles and Lords of the Senat &c. But this day was kept but a few years. For about fix years after, he faith, by occasion that both Confuls lay fick it was ordained that the first of July should be the ordinary day. And this also I find was changed to another, what oever it was, for named it is not; and therefore uncertain. But this happed in the four hundred and thirteenth year after the Cities foundation: as Livy about the beginning of the eighth book sheweth in these words; And when the Consuls were commanded to refign up their Magistracy before the time to the end that new Confuls might the fooner be created, against fo great troubles of war, or . For in these words [The sooner, or .] the declareth that the usuall day of entier into government was then changed. But as it is not certainly fet down what day this was ifo the other was as well known : for foon after, and namely, the eighth year following it was appointed. to wit, the first day of July. Immediatly therefore (quoth he) the new Confuls, L. Amylins Mamercus, and Cn. Plantins were enjoyeed that day (even the first of July) on which they began their office, to agree and part between themselves their Provinces. As for the month, wherein for the most part the assembly for election of Magistrates was holden, we read it was February; like as the thirteenth of March was ordinary for them to begin their government. For this day held alwaies during the second Punick war and the Macedonian, and longer than so. Thus Livy testifieth in many places (which to quote is needless) as in the fixt book of the second Punick war, and in the beginning of the first book as touching the Macedonian. By which, who leeth not that there is great variety in the month and day both, whereupon the Magistrates were wont to begin their rule? But whereas all the certainty in computation and account of the time dependent upon a precise, exact, firm, and settled reckoning of years months, and daies; and seeing that in Livier flory it is neither expresly shewed, what year, month or day, the Magistrates began their government, nor precisely noted when the reckoning altered; considering also that nothing therein is more wavering and inconftantly delivered; than the very usual day of entring into Mightracy: what masvel is there, if authors diffent fo much about the computation of the times? whiles one beginneth at this month, another at that: whiles some, I say, airribe these Magistrates created to this year, other attribute the fame to another?

. Thirdly, there being great difference between Dionysius and Lion, as well about the reckoning of the times and years, as the acts and affairs that thereimpassed; all seemeth to have risen hereupon, that the purpose of Livy was not to deliver exactly the acts and occurrents of greatest antiquity which hapned in the State of the people of Rome, and which by many writess aforetime had?

been most diligently set down and penned to posterity: but to record and write those thingsefoecially, which from the time a little before the second Punick war had been atchieved by the people of Rome unto the age wherein himfelf lived. But because (as Polybina most wisely and pithila writeth) a generall flory cannot be understood by particular registers; and for that an Historiographers study & endeavour Sught to be employed rather in an universall treatife, than in particular discourtes: therefore, left to great a piece of work as his, wanting a beginning, should feem maimed & unperfect; in the formost 20 books he tlightly & briefly ran over the deeds of the people of Rome from the foundation of the City, unto the beginning of the second Punick war. But Dionylius professing purposely to describe the ancient monuments of the Romans, thought it his part to overpass and omit nothing worthy of remembrance, but most curiously and exactly harh delivered all things pertinent, either to the calculation of the times or discourte of affairs, infomuch as those things whereof Livy hath scantly made 3 books he hath declared at large in eleven. Hereupon if a man read in Dionyfius, the ancient beginning and original of the Roman Empire. and examine welche times how they are by him digefted & compare the fame with the brevity in Livy, no doubt he will prefer the diligence of the former before the overhaltiness of the later. But if the indifferent reader confider the purpose and intent of them both he will yield unto either of them their due praise; & whereas Livy making haste to other matters, hath either let pass or more flightly handled tome things, he will judge him worthy rather to be exculed then reproved for it.

To these three causes above rehearsed, others also might be adjoyned; namely, the ordering of the years by Romulus, and the variety as touching that year wherein Rome was founded: but it may toffice only to touch these & point unto them with the finger. Howbeit, this we think good to advertise and adminish the reader by the way; that a beit in the digesting and reckoning of the Cost, we have let before our eyes to follow the marole tables and monuments of Verrius Flaccus, and according thereunto have framed and applied the computation of the years: yet that year before the 250 as also the other, which Verrine rejected, we have inserted with the refl, that our account might fall out just with the sum of the years, as they are collected by Varro, Which, before us, Onuphrius Panvinius a most learned man hath done in his Kalender, thinking that the year which Verriss and they that followed him rafed out was the 423, and therefore he hath put it to the rest without Consuls, according to the Capitoline records.

Of the computation of times usually observed by the Romans, and of the year of the Cities foundation.

He calculation of years was taken and observed by men in old time divers and sundry waies. The Achaens (as we read) received it from the revolution of the stars: the Argives from their women Priests; as for example, if Chrysis such a year were chief Priest to offer sacrifices, they counted the number of years from the faid Chryfis. But many have derived and fetched the course and consequence of their acts and affairs, from the years before Troy was built, or elseaster the winning thereof. Howbeit, from the 408 year after the captivity thereof, by occasion of the Olympian games, which Hercules first instituted in the honour of his great grandfire by the mothers fide, and which by his fon Iphiclus (or Iphitus, as some will have it) were renewed that year: from that time (I fay) they began to number the years by the Olympiads, especially among the Grecians, whole flory (as Enfebius affirmeth) is not of any credit but from the time of the first Olympias. The Hebrews (like as other nations in the East) received the denomination and reckoning of the years from their KK. The Athenians, from their Eponymi (as they called them) but that in their Archarefia, that is, the election of their Magistrates which were wont to hold for certain daies about the beginning of the year, they counted in this wile, and newtres neutransiae To Sendri il de Sendri, i.e. the tenth or eleventh of the first Prytancia. And hereof it teemeth, that the name cometh To improus; as it from thence, their acts received both the time and also the name. After the example of the Athenians and others, the Romans reckoned their daies, made their Kalender, and registred their acts by such and such Consuls; noting thereto otherwhiles the year from the Cities foundation. But about it there is much more divertity in authors, than about that wherein the first Consuls took their government. And seeing the clearing and declaration of that point is not impertinent to this place, briefly we will rehearle the opinions of authors as touching the time when the City of Rome wasfounded.

To begin therefore at them, who (according to the common received opinion of others) have written longer ago and further off, Timaus Siculus (I know not upon what reason induced) hath recorded, how the City was built by Romulus much about the time that Carthage in Affrick by the Tyrians, namely, in the 38 year before the first Olympias.

L, Cincius (a Senator of Rome by Calling) faith it was in the fourth year of the twelfth Olympias: Q.F. bius Pictor (a most ancient writer of the Roman story and of greatest credit) attributeth is to the first year of the eight Olympias.

Polybius Megapolitanus, and Diodorus Siculus quote the second year of the 7 Olympias. Appollodorus Q. Lutatius Catulus, C. Cornelius Nepos, Eratosthenes, M. Porcius Cato, Diony sius Halicarna faus, and Theophilus Antiochenus, name the first year of the 7 Olympias.

M. Verrius Flaceus, (the avoucher of the Capitoline stone-records) T. Livius, C. Julius Solinas, Clemens Alexandrinus, and others, will have it to be the fourth year of the 6 Olympias. L. Tayuntins

L. Taruntius Firmanus M. Terentius Varro, T. Pomponius Atticus, M. Tullius Cicero, Augustus Cafar C. Plinius Secundus, Plutarchus Charonaus, Domitianus Cafar Augustus, P. Cornel, Tacitus, Cass. us Dio, A. Gellius, L. Septimius Severus Augustus Cenforinus, M. Juliut Philippus Augustus Euschius Pamphil. Cafarienfis Entropins, Paulus Orofins, Paulus Diaconus Longobardus: and after the time of C. Cafar Dictator, the common opinion of the people of Rome (which we also go by) will have the City to be founded the third year of the fixt Olympias.

But by what motives and reasons each one of these authors is induced & whereby they would feem to confirm their feveral opinions needless it is in this place for to declare : both because the freculation hereof pertaineth properly to another profession, and also for that (besides Plut arch in Romalus, Solinus in the I chapter of his Polyhiftor, and Camers in his annotation thereupon) the question hath been so throughly handled by Onuphrius Panginius in the first book of his Calender that the thing requireth no further examination.

Now for the day on which the foundation of the City of Rome was laid by Romelus, it was the *eleventh day before the Calends of Mar, called Parilia or Palilia, Now was this a feltival day to *21 of Aprilia Pales the goddess of shepherds, celebrated by the faid shepherds upon the eleventh Calends of May in the fields and country villages, for the chafing away of wolves, for the preservation of their ship and cattell from dileases, or for the safe yearing and bringing forth their young: whereupon they were called Parilia. Of this matter writeth Properties in his fourth book, in this wife:

A feeft there was, Palilia, our fathers did it call, And on that day they first began, for Rome to build a wall. Ovidalfo in the fourth book of his Falti:

A time full meet they chose, with pough the plot to mark,

Dame Pales was hand, and so began the wark.

The same is avouched by M. Tullius, Plut arch, Solinus and others, And that these Palilia were solemnized ordinarily the eleventh day before the Calends of Mar, appeareth as well by the old marble Calenders as also by the same authors before rehearled.

Of the first soveraign Magistrates of the City of Rome, namely of the KK, who were in number serven.

LL forts of policies and governments in a Common-weal which are fet down and named by ancient Writers, the City of Rome (were it by the fat all course of destiny or upon fome troubles in the State) hath received and endured every one: fo as no Commonweal in manner there can be found, wherein they succeeded so one after another, as they did in the very City of Rome. For in the beginning, the KK, ruled it; but when they for their exceffive outrage and inordinate luft exercised upon their Citizens and subjects. were depoted and expelled, the Coff (and after them the Tribunes military in Coff authority) held the toveraignty. But in process of time, when this frame and form of Common-weal (simply the best) was by the outrage of the two Gracehi (Saturninus and Drufus Tribunes of the Commons) put out of joynt and troubled, untill such time as their power and authority was by Syllarent in twain, and the Commons differzed of their lands and killed : then the administration of the Common-weal was restored again to the Nobles and principal persons of the City. But at length, when it was opprefied again by the civill war of Pompey and Cafar, the foveraign rule of the State was devolved upon the Empire of Cafar alone; wherein, being first straken a tew years betore, through the wicked infolency and luft of the three Triumvirs, it continued untill the time that it fell to utter min. We therefore will briefly go through all these sorts of government; in that successive order as they followed one after another, and first begin with the KK.

R Omalus, the founder of the City, reigned thors) 37 years; in which time, he laid the 37 years; for so many Livy affigneth unto first ground-work of the Roman Empire, with him. Likewise Diony fins in the first book, which he repeateth also in the second: and Plutarch in Nums different not from them, howfoever in Romulus, he writeth, that he departed this world in the 37 year of his age. Solinus in like manner rehearling his worthy acts attributeth unto hisraign 37 years. Only Entropins (1. book 4.chap.)alloweth unto him 39 years : but Cufpinian thinketh very well that the Copy is corrupt. This Prince having raigned (according to the more common received opinion of au-

excellent laws and ordinances, and established both: wil and also military discipline, departed this life upon the Nones of July, which day was called afterwards, Nona Caprotina: by occasion that he in mustering and reviewing his army at the lake of Capra, was conveyed out of mens fight: whereupon the people fled as amazed at the fudden death of their King, as Platarch & Dionyfius do witness. This Romalus after his * deification was named Quirinus, of a Aportheofite which furname Ovid in his * Kalender giverh * Fall 3, Sine these reasons.

Some read thus, * Arma. * Romanus vicerat, but corruptly.

Sive quod balla quirmprifcie ell dicta * Sabinis : Bell icus a telo, venit in * aftra 'Yeus : Sive (uo regi nomen poffuere Quivites. Seu quia * Romanu junzerat ille Cures.

Or clie the Curets, whom he brought with Romans

That he was base born, and could not avouch his own father, befide other writers, Plutarch especially affirmeth in his Theleus. Howbeit. the old opinion went current, that he was by Mars begot in stealth of a vestall virgin, Ilia, Rhea or Sylvia, for so many names there go of her; and that first he was called Romus, of Ruma, which fignifieth a teat or pap, and afterwards by way of flattery, Komulus.

Intervegents.

Por one year after the death of Ramulus the noblesfell to variance & Grove who should be K but by reason, that no one person excelled above the rest in that state so newly founded. there grew feverall factions & debates in their head corporations. They who were descended from the Sabins (because after the death of Tafrom the Sabins (because after the death of I a-tius none of them raigned with Remulus in e- Numa Pompilius the second K. raigned 43 years. quall fociety) were defirous to have a K. created out of their body, because they would not forgo their hold and poffession in the Empire. But the old Romans could not away with a thranger-King. Howbeit, as different as they were in affections, all were willing to fet up a K. as having not tafted yet the sweetness of libertv. The Peersmoreover mightily feared (by reaion that the neighbour States bordeting round about were provoked against them) left some forraign force might affail their City left thus without loveraign government, and the army without a le der. Whereupon the two hundred Nobles agreed among themselves to enter into an aflociation of rule, and made ten Decuries : and in every Decury created one to have the foversignty over the rell. These Senators were then 100 in number, as Livy faith, and according to Plutarch a hundred and fifty. But Dionyfins writeth, that there were two hundred of the Sibins & as many Romans. After this they cast lors; and their Decury unto whom the lottery firftfell ruled the City: howbeit not all of them at once, but one alone had the regall ornaments, and the Lictors going before him. Five daies he governed and no longer; and fo by this order in courie the nobles of every Decury governed the City fifty daies. For after five daies determined the whose lot was first to govern in that Decury, delivered up unto the fecond the imperial dignity together with the enfigns thereof: and he again when his five daies were expired, unto a third, and so to the tenth. Thus when these ten first Interregents had passed one 50 daies a second Decury of Semitors in like manner ruled the City other 50daies; and thus they went round through all untill they had fulfilled a years space in this regency. This government was of the thing it felf called Interregnum, which name it fill retained afterwards, and the men likewife were named Interreges. In this year therefore was the Manistracy of the Interregents first devised among the Romans. And not only after the death of Romulus the State was ruled by Interregency. but also after the decease of Numa, Tullius, and Ancus Kings. In like manner during the time of the f. ee State and Common-weal, after the time of yearly Magistrates expired, the said government took place very often before the creation of new: for they held the affembly for elections, wherein new governors were by the people created. Now the office and charge of this interregent was, during the time of his regency (which ordinarily passed not five daies) to execute all those sunctions in the City which belonged either to KK. or Coff. namely, to minifler inflice, to rule the Common-weals to hold a Senat, and there to propound the affairs of State, and lastly, to summon the generall assembly for chusing new Magistrates. As touching the beginning of Interregents, Dionyfius in his fecond book, Livy in his first , Plut arch in Numa, Sext. Ruffus, Eusebius and other old writers. have written at large.

Ne year of Interregency being thus accomplished, the people of Rome thought this a grievous and heavy manner of government; and the Commons grumbled that their fervitude was manifold more than before, as having two hundred Lords over them inflead of one. Which when the Senators perceived, they agreed at last upon this point, That the old Senators should create a King, whom they would, so he were not one of their own body and degree. Whereupon Numa Pompilius (for that in inflice & wildom he excelled all other) was called out of Cures a City of the Sabins, to be their King. That he raigned three and forty years, all accord, fave Entropius, Enfebius, and Caffiodorus (late writers) who let down but one and forty, as Onuphrins and Seconius have obferved. Of this K. Dionyfius in the fecond book Livy in his first, Solinus in his second chapter, Plutarch Pliny, and Eutropius in his life; in like fort Valerius M. ximus have delivered much in record. He died not much above the age of 80 years. as Plut arch writeth; for born he was(as he tellifeth) the fame day whereon Romalas laid the first foundation of the City namely the twelfth Calends of Mar. Now for the name of Numa, tome fay it was the forename of Pampilins. But out of Sextus Pompeius it appeareth, that neither Tullius nor Nums were forenames, as also by this conjecture, for that the fons of Numa are by Diony finicalled by other fundry names divers from the family. Some thought therefore that Numa, Ancus, Arunt. Volutus, Drufus, Faultus, Jalus, Mammurius, and certain other furnames, were at first forenames, as Markanurin his Annals hath very well no-

IN this year happed the fourth change of the Roman government: for the administration of the weal publike, fell from Tribunes military in confuls authority, to the Tribunes of the commons. The authors that procured this mutation, were (as Livy reporteth) c. Licinius Stolo and L. Sextins, Tribunes of the commons, who in the former year having promulged three laws in favour of the commons and against the power of the Patritii, the first forredrefling of debts; a second for a sint of lands and possessions: & the third, that there should be no more elections of Tribunes military and that one of the confuls should necessarily be chosen a commoner: seeing they could not go through with these laws, by reason of their own fellows oppositions (whom of purpole the Nobles had made for themselves) tell into an anger, and would luffer no entile Magifrare of State to be created, nor any election to be holden, but only of Ædiles and Tribunes, both of commons. This defolate effate and want of Magistrates (whiles the commons made the fame Tribunes fill, who with unceffant and invincible perfiftance never gave over rocrofs the election of Tribunes military) continued in the city for the space of five years, as Live faith. This want of Magiffrates Diodorns calleth draggia, and cafteth it upon the former vear But Sext , Rufus, Entropins, Caffiodorus, and Zonaras write that they roled the Hate not five years but four only. Papirius, L. Menenius, Ser. coruelius, and Ser. Sulpiisus, who writeth also, that after them there was another Anarchy, and when that was overpast and gone, then were created A. Manlius, L. Furus, Serv, Sulpiisus, and Serv, Cornelius. But his story, as well through his own default, as the negligence of the writers that copied out same, there is a contusion of yearly Magistrates.

Two Dictators without any curule Magistrats of State besides,

Presently in the very beginning of the year, they proceeded to put it to the trials of a finall iffue, what should become of the foresaid laws proposed by Licinius and Sextius. When the tribes were called to give their voices, and the publishers of the laws were not hindred by the negatives of their Colleagues coming between; the Nobles began then to quake for fear, and in all hafte betook them to their two last helps and means of refuge the foveraign and absolute government, and the principal Citizen and greatest man of all others. Resolve they did to nominate a Dictator, and Marcus Furius Canillus was the man; who took unto him for General of the horsemen L. Emylins, But when the Captains and ring-leaders of the Commons dealt very bitterly and roughly against Camidus, he (as Livy writeth) refigued up his Dictator-ship. Plutarch also testifieth the same: who like wife avoucheth the cause thereof, which Livy goeth about to disprove. But both Live and Plut arch do affirm, that in the room of Camillus thus giving over his place, there was a fecond Dictator created. Livy faith, it was R. Manlius, Plut arch suppressent his name: but they agree both, that C. Licinius was the Gend-sall of the horse. Howbeit, they mean not both, one and the felf-fame man, For Livy faith and that cruly, that it was he who had been Tribane military in Confuls authority before: But Plat tarch nameth him, who was the author of the fedition and of the new laws: wherein he faulteth. For the Captain of the foresaid sedition. was this year also made Tribune of the Com. the ninth time: but Tribune of the Com. and Generall of the horse at one time he could not be. And therefore Onuphrius thinketh him to have been the fon of P. Licinius Calous military Tribune, and who had to his grandfather that Put Lieunas who of the Com, was the first big burns military. Of this, fee more in his Kalender.

7 Hen L. Sextius and C. Licinius Trib. of V the Com.now chosen the tenth time. were more and more eager and instant in the publishing of their laws, in the end the authority both of Dictator and Senat, was conquered by the firong hand of the Tribunes. For they prevailed, not with standing all the Nobility was against it, that there should be holden a solemn affembly for election of Confuls : and that, (by vertue of their laws which they carried clear before them) the one of the Consuls should be a Commoner. By which means, L. Sextins was the first Consul created from out of the Commons. But when the nobles denied flatly to approve the same by their assent, insomuch as the Commons were at the point of infurrection and ready to leave the City: the discord & disfention was at length taken up and appealed by the mediation of the Dictator : and as the nobility was content to yield unto the commonalty a Conful, fo the Commons granted unto the nobles one Prator or Lord chief Instice within the City, and him to be created from out of the Nobility. Granted also unto them now first it was that two Ædiles Curule should be chosen out of the Patritii. The Commons conferred the Confulthip upon D. Sextins (by whose law it was first obtained) and for companion in government he had L. Emplius Mamercus. Thus much Livrand Planarch: who altogether with Caffiedorns put down for Coff. L. Empline a Patrician and L. Sextine a Commos ner, The fame, Diodanus nameth Lu. Emplial Mamerous and La Lateranus. Now this Late ranus is the furname of Sextins, as appeareth in a table of record in the Capitoll, wherein the confuls are thus to be feen, Mamercinus & L. Sextius Sextinus Lateranus: as also in the Sicilian registers they are called Mamercinus and Lateranus. In the book entituled De viris Illufribus of famous men, we find written that & was not L. M.Popilius Lanas. Cn. Manlins.

I Ivy and Cuffiodorus name this year Confuls in this for: but Diodorus calleth them, M. Popilus Lanatus, and Co. Manlius Imperiofus, This was the first man of the Popilii, surnamed Lanas, The reason of which name Cicero readerst in his book Bonus, 18ying, M. Popilius being Conjul, and at the same time offering sacrifice in his robe called Lana, for that he was Flamin to Carmenta, upon news brought unto him that the commons were up and filen in a commotion against the Nobles, came in that attrie and habit as he was into the afteriby; and what with his authority of countenance, and what with his eloquence of speech, appealed the sedition.

396 C.Fabius. C.Plautius.

Loy and Caffiodorus have these above-named for the Consuls this year: but in Diodorus they are named M. Fabius and C. Platius. In the Capitoline records Ambritus and C. Plantins Proculus.

C. Martins. Cn. Manlins.

Dodorns, Livy, and Cassiodorns name the Consuls of this year, C. Martins and Ca, Manlins, This Ca. Manlins was Consul the first time, two years before, Cuspinians book and the Greek records have Ruislins and Capitolinns,

M.Fabius Ambustus II. M.Popilius Lanas II.

405 L.Furius Camillus. P.Claudius Craffus.

Leius Favius Camillus the Dictator restored the nobles again to their former possession of the Consulthip: and being himself for that good demerit created Consul, with the great love and heavy affection of the nobles, nominated for this Collegue, Publius Clandius Craffell; Thus saith Lievy. The same Consuls are fer down by Eastfodorus. But Diodorus, nameth them Emplius and T.Quinius. The Sicilian registers, Camillus and Craffes, Cierco in Cato maketh mention of these Consuls, saying, that Plato came to Tayenum, when L. Camillus and P. T. Manlius Torquatus. C. Plantius.

Loy and Caffiodorus nameth them for Confuls this year. Cuspinians Kalender and the Sicilian records, Torquastus and Venno, In a fragment of the Capitoll there is to be read the surname of Manlius, Imperiosus Torquasus.

> 408 M.Valerius Corvus II. C.Patelius.

These are named Consuls by Livy, and Caffodown: but Culpintans Kalender and the registers of Sciety shew for Consuls, Corvinus and Libo. As for the name c. Pætelius, it is described by his Dictatorship, which (according to the Capitoll evidence) he bare in the year 440: for in a fragment (testisying his Consulsip) there appeared hos more but one of his form ans. Fischus,

M.Fabins Dorfo. Ser. Sulpitius Camerinus.

These were the Consuls created for this year, as Livy and Cassinary write. Diodorus allo although not in the right place) alleageth M. Fabius and Ser. Sulptius Consuls. The Sicilian registers, Dorso and Camerinus. Both these Consuls were Patritii, which Livy omirted.

M.Valerius Corvus IIII. M Attilius Regulus.

This year, when the Ausones that inhabined the City Cales; took arms and combined with the Sidicins, M. Valerius Corvus, a right noble General; was created Consult the fourth time, having to his Collegue (as Lroy writeth) M. Attilius Regulus. Cassiodorus likewise declareth the same for Consults; and so doth Diedorus, but that he leaveth out their surrames: which appear extant in the Sicilian registers.

T.Veturins. Sp.Posthumius.

The Dickator held an affembly for the eledator of Confuls, wherein were created (according to Livy) thele above-named, so fay Caffiodorus also and Diedorus, Zonarus nameth them Tiber Calvinus, and Sp. Swithout Confuls, besides the account of the years, according to the Capitoll monuments, albeit they fee neither in Livy, nor in any other, mention thereof; and all to make up the totall fum collected by Varro. And that the faid year should at this time especially be interposed the tables of the Capitoline records do shew. For whereas in them thus engravenit is, M. Valerius Corvus Conful the fourth time, in the year of the City 419 and again L. Æmilius and C. Plautius, in the year 414: to the end that thele records might agree one with another, of necessity there must be put a year between. For leave out that, then both L. Æmylins the Conful should fall upon the year 414, and the totall sum of the year in Varre and the Capitoline tables be overthrown. That this odd year was now above all other times to be cast between, Gregory Haloander (who left in writing a Chronology of the Confuls) faw long before them: for he over-passed this year wholly, notedwithout Confuls. But Sigonius and Onuphrius are of opinion, that this year there was an Anarchy, and the Common-weal without Confuls, or other Magistrats of state, by occasion of the pestilence, whereof Livy writeth.

A.Cornelius II. Cn. Domitius.

Ext to them (according to Livy and Cassion) were L. Emplius Mamercus, and C. Plaus ins Ceased Conside. Didarias nominatest L. Papprius with L. Plotius. The Sicilian regiters, Mamercinus and Decianus. How both these are to be described, their triumphs upon record in the Capitol do evidently shew. These Considerance upon their government the first day of July.

P. Platius Proculus. P. Cornclius Scapula.

Loy and Caffiodorus put down [for Confuls] P. Plantius Proculus, and P. Cornelius Scapula, Diodorus, P. Cornelius and A. Pothumius. The Sicilian regitters Venue and Scipio. One phriss thinketh this Plautius ought to be forenamed not Publius but caius: who in his Confulfhip which he bare afterwards with Appius Caeus, was furnamed Venox (as Frontinus supposeth) for finding, certain springs and veins of water within the carth.

c. Plantins Proculus. Q. Publilius Philo II.

Loy and Cassidarus match together in the Contulhip for this year, L. Cornelius Lentus, and Q. Publitus Philo, Diodorus L. Cornelius and Q. Publitius. The Sicilian registers, Lontus and Philo, L. Papyrius Mugillanus Curfor. C. Porelini.

Onominated Confuls this year, C. Pavilins

the third time, and L. Papprius Mugillanus, by Caffiedows. Solimus maketh mention of these Coofuls in his five and thritteth chapter. As for Papprius, Livy, indeed turnameth him here Mussillanus, but he faith that he findeth him in ochter. Annals by the name of Carfor. In the Greek records they be Libo and Curfor. Now as touching c. Petilius, he is to be written with the numerall note II, and not III. as Sigonius and Outphrius do admonish. For it is not the fame man who was Consul in the 393 year, but his fon, 429 L. Furius Camillus II. Junius Brutus Scava.

Lu, Furius Camillus the (cond time, and Junius Brutus Sceva, Diodorus, L., Furius, and Dojumius, The Sicilian registers, Camillus and Brutus,

I Meins Furius, unto whom the charge of Samnium fell by lot, fortuned by occasion of ficknels to forgo the war there; and was commanded to nominate for the managing of martiall affairs a Dichator-whereupon he pronounced L. Papirius Curfor, the bravelt warrior in those daies; by whom Q. Fabius Rullianus was named great Mafter of the horse. Afterwards Curfor turned him out of that Mastership of horse, because without his warrant he had fought (although it were fortunately) against the Samnits when himself was out of the way and gone to Rome for to take the Auspices anew and in his room he substituted L. Papprisus Craffur. Thus write Livey, Eutropius, and Valerius, in the second book,

431 • Sulpitius Longus II. Q. Emylius [L. Aulus] Cerretanus

I Meius Papprius the Dictator, before he left his Magilitacy, created Confuls, c. 5 Aufptius Longus II, and Q. Emplius cerretanns, Some Annals have Aulius, Thus much Livy, In like manner the Sicilian registers have Longus and Cerretanus, But Diodorus cortuptly for Aulius hath Elius.

Q.Fabins. L.Fulvins.

Ley and Cassiodorus deliverunto us for Confuls this year, Q. Fabius and L. Fulvius: whom the Capitoll records of the triumphs name Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus, and L. Fulvius Carvus. Marvell it is therefore, that in the Scillian registers, they are put down, Cursor and Sylla;

433 T.Veturius Calvinus: Sp.Posthumius.

This year Livy and Caffiedarus fer forth for Confuls, T. Teturius c alvinus and Sp. Poffhuminis: cicero in his third book of Offices writeth, that they were twice Coff. Zonarus calleth calleth the one of them T.Calvinus, by a familiar forename unto that house and kindred of the Veturi. The Greek records exhibit unto us Calvinus and Albinus. Of these consuls as also of the Caudine peace, Cieron in his book of old age; Pliny also in his book of famous men, Gellius in his 17 book and 21 chap. Florus in his 1 book and 2 chap. Orașiu in his 3 book and 2 chap, do make mention.

L. Papyrius Cursor II. C. Publilius Philo.

Loy and Caffodorus flew for this yeats Confuls, Q. Fublilius Philo and L. Papprins Carfor, the fecond time, The Sicilian regiders, Curfor and Philo. But that this Philo should now be third time Conful, his Confulfities do plainly show.

435 L. Papyrius Curfor or Mugillanus . Q. Aulius Corretanus II .

I Pry faith, there is some doubt, whether L. Papprius Cursor were this year created Consul the third time, with Q. Amylius Cerroranus the second time: and for his good service in war at Luceria, continued still in government: or rather L. Papprius Maggillanus, and so the surname was mistaken. Cassisdorus deliverechunto us L. Papprius and Q. Ansius Cerroranus. The Sicilian registers, Papprius and Cerroranus. The monument of his triumph in the Capitoll, alloweth of cursor and not Mugillanus. The author of that book which Cuspinan hath set forth, following other Annals, setteth down Mugillanus.

M.Fostius Flaccinator, L.Plantius Venno.

SEcing that for twelve years next enfuing, we have the Capitoline tables whole and found, the lefs trouble we need to be at in reforming and redreffing the names of the Magilitats, Both they, and alio Livy with Caffiodorus reprefent non us for this years confuls, M.F. of his Flaceinator and L. Plantius Venno. Diodorus calleth them. L. Platius and who of safe. The Sicilian registers, Venno and Thaccus.

C. Junius Bubuleus. Q. Emplius Barbula.
Affiedorus putteth down c. Junius and Quintus Emplius for Confuls. Livy, c. Junius Bubuleus, and Quintus Emplius Barbula, A flone in the Capicoll, Q. Emplius Barbula, and
C. Junius Bubuleus Brusus.

Sp. Nautius, M. Popilius,

Ext follow in order Sp. Nantins and M. Popilins Confuls, according to Livy and Caffodorus. Rutilus and Lana their furnames, are by Sigonius teflored unto them: and the same also are to befeen in the Sicilian books of record.

L. Papyrius Curfor IIII. Q. Publius Philo IIII.

The Confuls names of this year, through the default of the writers that copied forth Livies books, are there left out: namely, L.P.a. piriss Carfor the fourth time, and Q. Pablilius Philo likewife the fourth time: as it is written in caffindorss, in the Capitoll tables, and in caffinians book, wherein they are named conformant Philo. Howbeit, in the Sicilian registers they are called carfor and Layas.

440 M.Patelius. C. Sulpitius.

I say and Cassindarus report for Consuls this year. C. Sulptius and M. Parelius. But Diedorus that C. Sulptius and μαρχω πόση. Corruptly for ποιτάν. Φ. The Capitoline writers, have M. Pætelius Libo and C. Sulptius Longus the third time. The Sicilian registers, Longus and σαμνίτω, but there is a fault, as Sigonius truly thinketh.

441 L.Papirins Curfor V. C. Junius Bubulcus:

M.Valerius. C.Decius,

Ley writeth that there followed confuls MV alerius Max, and P. Decius: but Caffiodarus, faith M. Valerius and P. Decius: broating in his book of water-conduits, speaketh of these Consuls: whom he writeth to have been thirty years after the beginning of the Samits war. As for P. Decius, Liey asterwards calleth Mus., The Sicilian registers have Max, and Mus.

C. Junius Bubulcus III. Q. Emylius Barbula. II.

VVE find in Livy for Consuls this year, C. Junius Bubuleus the third time, and Q. Æmylius Barbula the second time: likewise in Cassiodorus, But Diodorus ament them C. Junius and Q. Æmylius. In the Sicilian registers, Bubuleus and Burbula, The same names are also in the Capitoll monuments, which be in Livy.

C.Martins Rutilins. Q.Fabius,

CAins Martins Rusilus and Q. Fabius be this years Confuls in Livy. But in Caffiederus.C. Martins Rusilus and Q. Fabius the fee conduing. Dioderus that C. Martins and Q. Fabius the fee ond time, The Sicilian registers show Rusus and Rusilus. The Capitol monuments, Q. Fabi- Empiricans book sheweth; Megellus and Alighus, Mane, Rusilanus, the second time, and C. vinus. These Cost, dothe L. Pripput down for to Martins, who afterwards in his second Censor- succeed Q. Fabins and P. Decim, leaving obtship in the 498 year, is sumamed Conformus.

those two years wherein we have set downsides

A year without Confuls. P. Papirius Dictator II.

T/Errius Flaccus interpoleth this year alfo without Confuls, wherein he reporteth L. Papirius Dictator the 2 time, with C. Junius Bubulcus Brutus the Master of the horse. This year Diodor#s, Livy, the Greek records, Cufpimans book and Cassiodorus do overleap, For Livy writeth that L. Papirius Curfor was nominated by the conful Dictator, and by him C. 74nius Bubulcus named Mafter of the horse; upon occasion that C. Martius the Cos. had no good fortune in his conduct of the wars in Samnium. This inferring of one year Onuphrius hath approved, that the computation of the years gathered by Varro might stand in force, which to the Capitoll tables putteth one year, whose indement we also are willing to follow.

> 446 Q.Fabius. P.Decius.

Ley writeth, that Fabius continued Conful Lethis year allo, for his fingular good lervice in fubduing and taming Herruria: and that he had for his companion in government Decius, Caffiodorus acknowledgeth for Cost. Q. Fabius the third time, and P. Decius the second time, Diodorus, P. Decius and Rullus, The Sicilian registers Mus and Rullus, The Capitoline tables, P. Decius Mus 11. and Q. Fabius Max, Rallianus, the third time.

447 App.Claudius L.Volumnius.

Loy faith, that immedially there followed confuls, App, Cludies and L. Folumnius. Caffieders and Diodens, Appius and Violens. The Skilian registers, App. Cludies Cacusand L. Folumnius. The Capitoline monuments have Flamma and Violens. Now whether one of these Consuls surnames be Violens or Violensis, One-phrius adversisted us to consider. For the capitols from hath it alwaies written Violens. But the Greek words have. Appius and Bioxáur Gas if the name were Violensis.

Q. Marsins Tremulus, P. Cornelius Arvina,

I for and Cassindorus register for the Consider of this year, Q. Marrins. Tremslus, with a Collegue adoption to similibidine state Q. Martins and Pt. Caenelinist: The Sicilian records, Trimbles and Actions. All the similar and Actions. All the similar and Actions. All the similar and Actions a Livy writteth) that elaudist with Viluminia, and Cornelius with Martius were consults, Whether his memory failed him in digesting of the annals, or of purpose he supposed that those two couple of Consuls were not truly recorded, and therefore overleapt them, I know not. A fragment there is of the Capitoline stone, which sheweth for this year, Magellus to be the surname of Posthumins, Therius the forename of Minutius, and M. of Fulous. Now the furname of Fulous were curvus and Petinus, as it appeareth written in his triumph.

P. Sempronius Sophus. P. Sulpitius Saverrio.

The Confuls next following were P. Sulpicitus Saverrio, and P. Sempronius Sophus, according to Livy and Caffiodorns. In Diodorus they are written P. Sulpitus and P. Sempronius. In the Greek registers, they stand Sempronius and Saverrio, Pliny writeth of these Confuls in his 33 book: but Sempronius he calleth Longus, Both of them are described thus by their triumphs, appearing upon record in the Capitoll, for in their Confulship-there is no more to be seen but Sophus and Publius.

L. Conutius. Ser. Cornelinus.

Diodorus; Livy and caffodorus report for Cost, this year, L. Genutius, and Servius cornelleus. The Sicilian registers have Aventiuens and Lentulus. The Capitoline writers put unto cornius the surname of Lentulus.

M. Hvius Denter. M. Emylius.

I'vy nameth for Confus this year M. Livius and c Emylius. Cassiodorus, M. Livius and L. Emplous Diodorus M. Livins and M. Emylius. As for the forename to Em lius, Sigonius and Onuphrius do think that more credit is to given unto Diodorus, than others: especially, seeing that in Livy there is mention made the year following of M. Emplius Paulus Generall of the horsemen, whom they all think to be the same man that this Conful. M. Livius is written Denter in the Capitoli records, which furname Livy in another place addeth to the Livii. Cushinians book in like manner setteth down Denter and Pantus as the furnames of these Confuls. The Sicilian registers, Denter and Emylins.

Two Dict ators, and no Conful.

This year allo of two Dictators without Confuls, Onuprius inferreth in his Kalender, bowbeite directed thereto by evidence of the Capitoll fragments: to the end that the calculation of Varro might agree in all respects; which,

which, if this year were over-flipped should be whally overshoome; although Diodere, Liery, and Collodore diffent sherefrom; and have out this year altogether. Whereof see Onughrius more at large in his Kalender upon this year 453.

M.Valerius. Q. Apuleius Pansa.

Immediatly after M. Livius and M. Emplians, Livy, and Caffedorus letter h pais the year of two Dictators without Confuls, bring in M. Valerius and Q. Apaleius Panfa tor Confuls, The Greek records flew Corvinus and Panfa. It feemeth that Livy by Marcus Valerius meaneth Maximus, for that he faith that prefently upon his Dictatorship he was made Cos. Now that Max. Valerius Max. Was Dictator the year before, he writeth plainly.

M.Fulvius Patus, 455 T. Manlius Torquatus,

I Ivy, and Coffiodorus declare for Conjuls this Lyear, M. Fulvius Patus and T. Manlius Torquains. The Sicilian registers have Patinus and Torquatus, Livy faith that Q. Fabius refuled the Consulship offered unto him without any suit of his. But T. Manlins the Conful, was by lot appointed to levy war against Hetruria, which took arms and prepared for war against the truce accorded upon. Now was he scarce well entred into the enemies confines, but as he exercifed among men of arms, and chanced to turn about his horse upon a full carrier, he was cult from his back: whereupon (for the prefent) he lay for dead, and within three daies after the faid fall ended his life. Then all the Centuries in general by their suffrages chose M. Valerius Col, whom the Senat purpoted to have made Dictator. Thus much Livy. By M. Valerius he meaneth Corvus, whom Cicero writeth in his book of old age, and Valerius Maz. in his 7 book and 48 chap, to have been Cof, now the fixt time, and that between this and the first there were 46 years, although Platarch in the life of C. Marins laith, they were but 45. Howbeit all of them call him Corvinus and not Cor-

L.Cornelius Scrpio. Cn.Fulvius.

New Fulvius and L. Cornelius Scipio are recorded Copiuls by Livy and Caffiedorus; but Scipio and Communalus, by Culpinians book: Scipio and Maximus by the Greek records.

Q. Fabius Max. IV. P. Decius Mus III.

Lyr and Coffiodorns alledge for Coss. this year, Q.Fabjus Max, the fourth time, and P.Detus Mas thire. The same Coss. whiniam book and the Greek records delivered unto us. The author that writeth of samous men, and Frantinus in his book of Stratagems, speak of P. Decius thrice Consul.

L. Volumening . Appins Clandin

Leinus Volumnius a Commoner, and Appins Claudius of noble bloud, were created Coff this year: even the same men who in their former Consulfhip were matched together, as Lavy and Coffiodorus write: but in the Sicilian reginers they are found written, Claudius and Vioteria, Howbeit, Ciero in his book entituled Caroreporteth, that between the two Consulfhips of App. Cacus were ten years.

Q.Fabins V. P. Decius IV.

I Any and Caffiodorus both witness, that the Coffinext following, were Q. Fabinithe fift time, and P. Decius the 4 time, who had been companions together already in 2 Consulats and in one Censorship. The Sicilian registers have Rallys and Mas: of which Consuls Cieero speaketh very often: Valer. Max. likewise, Paeterculus allo. Platarch Frontinus in hist book of Stratagems, the author of the book of famous men, Europius, Orofius, and others: who all report, that the Cof. P. Decius, following the example of his father, offered himself to die for the Roman legions, and by his death purchased a notable victory to the people of Rome.

460 L.Postumius Megellus, M. Atilius Regulus,

The Coss, next following, were L. Postumius Megellus, and M. Aislina Regulus, as Livy and Cassisdorus write. In the Sicilian records,

461 L: Papirius Curfor. Sp. Carvilius.

A Bier Livy and Caffiodories, the Coff. this year, were L. Paprine Curfor and Sp. Carvinius. After the Scijilan regilters, Curfor & Max. A ftone in the Capitolanaketh meneions of Papirius the fon of L. mephawo C. furnamed Curfor, whom Livy writesh to be the lon of Papirius 5 times Cof. Of these Cost. Pliny of Primamaketh mention in his 7 book and 60 thap. Pl. M. Max. histories in his 7 book and 1 chap. Pellevii in his 2 book 1 and the Lang in the year 456.

book, the Capitoli tables, and Zonaras, havedelivered, that this Fabius was the fon of Q. Max.
Rullianus, who had been y times Cos, before,
And here an end of the Consuls soo the fift so books.

L. Posthumius, C. Tunius.

Since that after this Confulthip, ten books oh Livy next enfuing be loft whom hitherto we have had for the most sufficient witness of this flory to as now we are in manner deftitute and deprived of the best helps of Annals, namely, Diodorus, Dionysius, and Lien; from hence forward we will use principally in digetting and reckoning the years by the Confuls, the authority and teltimony of Caffiodorus, the Sicilian records, and Cuspinians book: yet will we not in the mean while reject what help foever shall be ministred unto us by others. For this year therefore Caffiodorus writeth, that L. Postumius and C. Junius, were created Coss. whose surnames, Megellus, and Brutus Bubulcus, have not been left out fo much as in Cuffinians Kalender, nor in the Sicilian records. Livy also maketh mention of them in his 28 book, faying thus, Lu. Postumius Megellus the Interregent, was createdCol, with C. Bubuleus; by that very court and affembly which himself called and held.

464 P.Cornelius Rufinus. M'. Curius Dentatus

THE Coss, this year are recorded by Cassindarius, Pub. Cornelius Rushins, and M. Curius Demanus for whom in the Sicilian registers, appear Maximus the third time, and Mus the fix time. But of those forenamed Coss. Cierre maketh mention in his book, entituled Cato; Paterculus in his first book, Valerius Mus., in his six book, and 3 chap. Pliny also in his 7 book and 50 chap. Now this M. Curius was called Demanus, as Pliny writeth in his 6 book and 16 chap, for that he came into the world with teeth.

M.Valerius. Q.Caditius.

Arous Valerius and Q. Cedisius were afterwards Coff. as faith Caffodorus. The old book of Cufpinian putterth to them the furnames of Coruinus and Notinus: which in the Sicilian registers are overpassed. The Greek records shew unto us, Maximus and Mus: for Maximus was a surname allo of the Valerii Corvini.

Q. Martius. P. Cornelius.

Affiodorus this year delivereth for Confuls, Q. Martius and P. Cornelius, Cuspinians book and the Greek records add their furnames. Tremalius 11, and Arvinus 11, who had been Confuls together oncebefore.

M.Marcellus. Sp. Nantius.

Afficiarus avoucheth Consuls this year, M. Marcellus and Cn. Nautins. The Greek records and Cuspinians book, have Marcellus and Rutilus.

M. Valerius . E. Elius.

Arous Valerius and C. Elius are ranged in this year for Coll by Coffodorus Culfus niant book putteth forth; Maximous and Patust but the Greek tecords, Potitus and Patus. Now you must think; that both Maximous and Poristus are the surrames of the Valeriu.

C.Clandius. M. Emylius.

For this years Coll. C. Illiadrus hath C. Cl. ingdius and M. Emylius. The Greek records and Culpinians book, Canina & Lepidus: whereof the former is the furname of Claudius, the latter of Emylius.

C. Servilius. L. Cacilius.

By Cassiodorus, C. Servitus and L. Cacilius Macellus are placed Coss, in this year: for whereas in some copies of Cassiodorus, instead of Lu. Cacilius, is written Casius that is a fault; as Sigonius and Onuphrius have noted. To Servitus this Consol, the Greek records add the inriame of Turca, whom they put down Coss, with Dento, they would say Denter, as both Sigonius and Onuphrius suppose, For Denter is a inrname also given to the Cacilus, as appeareth by Livy.

P.Cornelius Dolabella. Cn. Domitius.

Assiodorus interreth P. Corn. Dolabella, and ch. Domitus for Cost. Caspinian Kaledder hath Dolabella and Colous; The Sicilian registers, Dolabella Maximus, And some think that Maximus was the furname of Dolabella, which he feemeth to have acquired by the honour that he had won in the wat againt the Gauls;

C.Fabricius. Q. Emylius

Affiodorus bringeth in for Coss. C. Fabricitus and Q. Emplius: but the Sicilian regiflers, Luscinus and Papus. Of them Cleero in his book Lelius, maketh mention in this manner:
We lee that Papus Emplius was familiarly acquainted with C. Luscinus: for so we have heard our fathers say, that they were two Coss, together, and companions in the censorship.
Moreover, Valerius in his chap, where he treateth of Poverty, maketh mention of c. Fabricius, and Q. Emplius Papus. This Emplius, Photarch in his Parallels calleth corruptly by the name of Paulus.

L. Emplins. Q. Martins.

There followed coff, as taffiodorni shewcuffininas took and the Greek records give alfotheir surnames, Barbula and Philippus: and the same also is evident by the records in the

P.Valerius. T.Coruncanim.

Ph. V derim and Tit. Coruncamins, are by Cafhodorus placed in this year for Coss. The Greek records, Culpinian book, Florm, Orofius, and Eutropius, give to Valerius the surname of Lavium. And Plus arch hath angives for massiver.

> 475 P.Sulpitim. P. Decina.

Text after thole, Caffiodor in putteth down P. Sulpitius Conful with P. Decim. The Sicilian registers, have Savennio and Min. Cicero in his 2 book, entituled De Fin, and in his Tufculan disputations, faith, That this Pub. Decime was the ion of that P. Decime who vowed him fell to death in the Sampits and Gauls war.

476 C.Fabricius. Q. Aemylius.

Affiodorus delivereth unto us for Consuls C. Fabricius and Q. Aemilius: whom Cnfpinians book and the Greek records, call Lufismus the facond time, and Papus. That these were fellows together once before in the Consular, Cicero writeth in his book Lalius, Plutarch in Pyrrhus, Gellius 3 book, chap. 8. Entropius, and Zonarus, make report of the same.

P.Cornelius. C.Junius.

Phb. Corneline, and C. Junius, are rehearfed for Confuls this year by Caffiodorus, Cuffinians book hath Rafinus the fecond time, and Brusus. The Greek records, Rufinus and Bubulcus, Zowarus hath Rufinus & Junius, Of P. Rufinus twice Co. (Cic. in his 2, book Of a perfect Orator, Vader, Max. in his 3, book, and 4, chap. Gellins in his 4 book, and 8 chap. in his 17 book likewife and 21 chap, and laft of all, Frontinus in his book of Statagems, make mention.

Q Fabius. C. Genutius.

Affood rus reporteth Q. Fabius and C. Gematius Confuls. The Sicilians registers have Gurges and Clepfun. Of these Coss. Orofus maketh mention in this wise-When Fabius Gurges was the second time Cos, with C. Genuius Clepfuns, a grievous pessilence reigned both in the City, and also in the territory about it.

M'. Curius. L. Lentulus.

Afficiorus and Eutropius deliver unto us for Coss. M'. Curius and L. Lensulus. The Sicilian registers, Dentatus and Lentulus. This is ethird Consulat of M'. Curius, which together with Lentulus Consulship, is drawn out of the Capitoll records of triumph this year, 480 Serv. Cornelius. M'. Curius.

Affiodorus, the weeth for this years. Coff.
Servius Cornelius and M. Curius, Cufpinians book and the Greek records, Mercuda, E. Dentassus the third time. This M. Conius is now Cof. the fourth time, for thrice he was before.
Concerning this Serv. Cornelius Mercuda, Pliny relateth and writeth, that he received a princely coronet of gold at the hands of L. Lennulas the Coff of the former year, for winning a town

C.Fabricius. C.Claudius.

Affodorus fetteth down, C. Fabricius and Licinius and Canina: Confuls: the Sicilius records, Licinius and Canina: Cuffin a s Kalender, Licinius and Cinna, Eutropius: Long Licinius and C. Claudius Canina. Welleus, Ful an Dorfo and Claudius Canina. Whereby it may be underflood, that the Confuls were alled, C. Fabius Dorfo Licinius, and Caiss Crowns Canina: for Dorfo Was an old name of the Fabi.

L. Papirius Curfor. Sp. Carvilius.

NExt after them, Cassiodarus nominateth for Cossi. Sp. Carvilius and Lu. Rapirius Cursor. The records both of Sicily and Lu. Rapirius Cursor. Cursor and Maximus. Both these were now Cossi. the second time as appeareth by their triumphs upon record in the Capitoll. Frontinus freaketh of them in his book. Of water-conduits, and Livy in his 24 book.

C.Quintius. L. Genutius.

Tis reported by Caffiodore, that C. Quintius and L. Genutus were Confuls. Cufpinians book and the Greek records, fet to their furnames, Claudius and Clepfina, Livy in his yook speaketh of one Tit. Quintius lame of one leg, from whom haply this furname is drawn.

484 C. Genutius. Cn. Cornelius.

R Eported there are for Confuls this year by Caffiedorus, C. Genutius and Cn. Cornellus; whole iurnames were Clepfins and Blafie, as it appeareth in Cufpinian book, This Cains Genetius is the fame, who before-time was Conful. As for C. Blafie, he is deficiibed by his Cenfording flanding upon record in the Capitell, The Greek records over-pais them both.

P. Sempronius. 3 or after & Q. Ogulphius App. Claudius. 3 some, Fabius Pistor.

A Fter Cornelius and Genutius Confuls, Cofficial fodorus bringeth in Pub. Semprenius, and

App. Clauding, and of purpose over-skippeth Q. Gule and Fabius Piffer, Zonaras, Q. Gallus and C. Fabius. Of them speaketh Europius, saying: When Q. Gulo and Fabius Pictor were Confuls, the Picenate raifed war ; and by the Confuls next following, to wit, P. Sempronius and App. Clanding they were vanquished. Pliny alfo in his 33 book and 3 chap. When Q. Fabine (quoth he) was Conful, filver was coined and flamped for money, five years before the fecond] Punick war. Theie Confuls, Velleim alfo reckoneth in his first book But Sigonius and Onuphrius advertise us, that the book of Entropiss is very faulty in one of these Consuls, and that in lieu of Quin, Gulo, it should be read Q. Ogulphius; for of this Gulo, there is in no place besides, any mention: so as they would have, that it should be Q. Ogalvins, fon of L. nephew of A. furnamed Gallus, who a little before was fent in embaflage to Prolomens. And it falleth out passing well, that they should match Ogalvius a commoner, with Fabius a Patritian. Alfo Onuphrius testifieth that in the most ancient hand-written books of Entropies, the name is found of Ogulvins. And, as both the Greek records, and also Zonaras, together with the more ancient and perfect copies of Entroping, agree to this his judgment : fo Hubertus Goltzius likewife in his Catalogue of Confuls, embraceth the same : and that which maketh most for the purpose, the old antiquities of coin witneis as much. But in the mean while this is worth the observation, that oftentimes in the most ancient pieces of money, the letter C is written for G: as for example here, Ocul, Cal. for Ogul, Galba.

P. Sempronius. App. Clandius.

Being that we settle the Consulship of the Stormer year, in Ogulvius and Fabius Pittor, and that upon the authority of Eutropius, the Greek records, Cuspinian, Zonaras, Onuphrius, and others; we will fet down for this years Comiuls , P. Sompronius and App. Claudius, whom Velleins in his first book calleth, Sempronius Sophus, and Appius the fon of Cacus. The Greek tecords, Semprenius Rufus Sophus: and Cuspinians book Rufus. Moreover, this also Golozius giveth us to understand, that the furname of this Sempronius is in old peeces of coin found written without an aspiration [Sopus;] which is no rare thing to be seen in such antiquities : for we read in others of them, Philippus, Tampilus, Graccus, Pulcer, Triumpus, for Philippus, Tampbilus, Gracchus, Pulcher Triumphus, and fuch like.

M. Attilius. L. Julius Libo.

Livepins puttern down for Confuls, M. Assiline and L. Julius Libe. The Sicilian registers. Regular and Libe. Calibaderus, M. Assilius and Lightins. And both of them are taken forth of the records of capitol triumphs.

of ever-skippeth Conaras, Q. Gallas the Europius (Ayrollow) and by the Congram by Creek records shew, Maximus and Vitalus, Zonarus, Q. Fabius, and Emplius (no double for Mannihus by some cror and sault of the copies. Calpinian out of some old books delivered unto us for Consuls, Q. Fab. Maximus and Lus, Mamilius, Osuphrius thinketh, that Q. Fab. Maximus Gurges was now thrice Consul.

Ap. Claudius. M. Fulvius.

Besides the capitol monuments, Polybius in his fifth book maketh mention of these Contulus, Geslius also, who calleth them thus, App. Claudsus brother of Cacus Suramend Caustary, Paterellus, and Pliny in his book of famous men: as also Appianus, Florus, Frontinus in his is book of Stratagems, Eutropius, Orosinus, and Calibadorus.

M'.Valerius. M'.Otacilius.

Affiodorus and Eutropius flew unto us, that M. Valerius and M. Ocacilius were Conf. Zonaras nameth Valerius Max, and Ocacilius Craffus. Cuffinians Kalender and the Sicilian records, Max, Meffula and Craffus. Of thele Confuls Ver. Valerius was in this government of his named Meffula: and Pliny likewife, in his fixt book and five and thirtieth Chapter.

L. Posthumius, Q. Mamilius,

Cassindary and Polybus put down for next Consuls, L. Possumus and Q. Mamilius; Zonavas nameth them, Possumus all Junus and Quintus Mamilius; The Stellian registers, Albinus, and Viculus: but the expitol monuments, L. Possumus ion of Lucius, nephew of Lucius; intramed Magallus, and Q. Mamilius ion of Q. nephew of M. surnamed Piculus:

L.Valerius. T.Otacilius.

Polybins and Caffiodorus match together in the Confulat for this year L. Valer. mand T. Oracilius: the furname of Valerina is Flace 12; and of Oracilius, Graffus, as it appeareth upon the capitol and Sicilan records, Cn. Cornelius. C. Duiliu.

Affiodorus and Zonaras bring in for Coff. Cn. Cornelius and C. Duilius. In like manner also Polybius, but only that in lieu of Julλι he hath λίβι . The Sicilian Registers thew Scipio and Duilius, Cn. Cornelius Scipio is furnamed also Asina, by the capital writers Orofius, Entropius, and Valerius in his fixt book chap, 10, of which furname Macrobius writeth thus in his first book of Saturnalia: The surname of Afina (qd, he) was given to the Cormeliis for that the first of the House Cornelia having either bought land, or given his daughter in marriage, when (after the folemn mannet) he was required to put in good fureties for fecurity, brought into the open market place a the als laden with money, and pawned down that prefently in flead of pledges.

C. Aquilius son of M. L. Cornelius son of L.

There are nominated by Cofflodorus for Confuls, C. Aguilus and L. Görnelius, The Sicilian regitlers, Florus and Scipio. Zonara, C. Florus and E. Scipio, Eutropius and Orofius, L. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Aguilus Florus, Polybius leaveth them out. The Capitoline moments agree with the Annals of Eutropius and Orofius.

496 A. Atilius Calatinus, Q. Sulpitim.

DOlybins avoucheth for this years Consuls, A. Atilius and C. S. Ipitius. Caffindorus, A. Atilie's Calatinus, and C. Sulpitius. The Sicilian Registers and Cuspinians Kalender, Calatinus and Patercule s. The capitol monuments, A. Atilius Calatinus and C. Sulpitius Paterculus. Zonaras, Atilius Calatinus, and Caius St lpitius. Of these Consuls, Polybius Cicero, Volerius, Florus, Frontinus in his Stratagems, Pliny the yonger Gellius, Eutropius, and Caffiodorus make mention. But concerning the forename of Sulpitius Pateroulus, the Capitoline tables dilagree one from another; to wit, those that carry the records of the triumphs, from those that thew the Confulthips and other magistracies; for in these latter monuments he is called Quintus, in the former Cains. Whereby Goltzius doth conjecture, that one man was not the author of both those records, namely, the Triumphal and the Consular,

Cn. Cornelius. 497 C. Asilii

Affiodorus sheweth unto us, Cn. Cornelius and C. Atilius Serranus, for Confuls: bur Polybins, C. Atilins. The capitol tables, C. Atilius Reoulus, Cufpinians Kalender and the Sicilian regitters, have Ragulus and Blafio the lecond time. But how Atilius should come by his furname Serranus, Pliny the weth in his 18 book, faving : In these daies the fields were tilled by the very hands of L. Generals themselves, and a man verily would believe thereby, that the ground loyed in a laureat plough-share and a triumphant plowman. Him they found a fowing, unto him they presented those honorable dignities, and so took he his surname Serranus. As concerning Blasio, all authors well neer befides, approve the judgment of Cuspinian: but Goltzius supposeth, that he was not the same man that was Conful before; and therefore he writerh him the fon of C. nephew of L. without putting to the numeral note II.

Q. Caditius. L. Manlius.

The next Confuls that increeded, were (by Cassindorus his taying) Q. Caditius and L. Manlius. The Sicilian registers name them Vulso and Caditius. Zonaras, M. Regulus and L. Manlius, Emropius, M. Atilius Regulas and L. Manlius Vello : and Polybius, M. Atilius and L. Manlius, Infenus in his 41 book maketh mention of these Consuls. But ye must understand, that Q. Cuditius died whiles he was in office, and M. Atilius was substituted in his room, and made Conful the fecond time; as appeareth evidently by the capitol tables, wherein it standeth thus upon record, Lu Manlius Vulfo Loni gus : and in flead of Q, Caditius, M, Atilius Regulas the second time: as also by Cuspinians book, wherein is written, Longus and Regulus,

M. Emplius Paulus, Ser, Fulvius Nobilior.

Polybius sheweth for the Coss, this year, Ser, Fulvius, and M. Aemylius. Cuspinians Kalender, Notition and Paulus. The Sicilian registers, Patinus and Paulus. Cosspoorus and Eutropius, together with the Capitoline records have Ser, Fulvius Nobelior, and M. Emylius Paulus, Cn.Cornelius. A. Atilius.

Affiodorus and Polybius report for this us. The capitol authors write, A.A.i.lius. The capitol authors write, A.A.i.lius Calatinus the feecond time, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio Afina likewife a fecond time. As touching Cn. Cornelius Afina twice Conful, thus writeth Yasterius in his first book: Cn. Cornelius S. Afina, who being Conful, was taken prifoner by the Carthaginians at Lipara when he had by the law him of arms loft what he per lie had, recovered all again, and was made Conflit the record time: to as, of a Conflit in became a captive, and of a captive twice Conful.

Cn. Servilius. C. Sempronius,

C. Assertius and Possessus put down for Confuls, Cri, Servilius and C. Schipponius. The Scirilius capies, Capie and Blasse. Zenoras, Scirilius Capie and C. Schipponius. Entrypius and Orosius, Cri, Servilius Capie, and Schipponius Blasse. Orthe same Consuls, Sabinus in his 30 book maketh mention, as also a stone of the Capitel.

C. Aureline Cotta. P. Serviline.

Affodorus bringeth in as Cost. C. Aurelius Cotta, and P. Geminus. The Sicilian regifiers, Cotta and Geminus: but thole of the Capitol, C. Aurelius Cotta, and P. Servilius Gemsnus. Zonarus, Pub, Servilius and C. Aurelius. Ciero in his book, entituled Luculus, writeth, that C. Costa, together with P. Servilius Gensinius, wist tyrice Conful. Frontinus allo in his fourth book of Stratagetins, and livewife Orgisu, make mention of G. Cotta Conful in Sictly.

L. Casilius Metellus. C. Furius,

Polybius letteth down for Confuls, L. Chille12 Metellus, and C., Favius, The Sicilian
12 Metellus, and C., Favius, The Sicilian
12 Metellus, and C. Favius, Caffodorus, Lis, Cacillus and C. Furius, Europus, Oforius, and 12 capitol Rome, L. Cacilius Metellus, and C., Furius, Pacilus, This is that Lu. Metellus, twice Conful and high priest, of whom Pliny writeth in his feventh book and three and fortieth

C. Acilius Regulus. L. Manlins.

D'Olybius placeth for this years Cohfuls, C. Arilius and L. Minishin. Copfus and c. Arithis Regulus, and L. Maillius. Cropfus and a captual flone, have C. Arithis Regulus, and L. Maillius Pulls, both Coff, the Regord time. Zenira di C. Arithis the Brother of Regulus and L. Maillius. The Sicilian records, Regulus and Vulfo.

P. Clandins. L. Junius,

Apadorita and Paly Bus inter for Comfilis the best year, Pal Chaudhis and L. Janisi. Zoniai. Z

created poor and these and forther changed man the themew of the forther the chief col writers and part with chief was in his first book and fourth chapter, speaketh of the same Confus.

TOZ!

P. Servilius. C. Aurelius

For Contils this year. Capitaline patters down P. Servilius and C. Rherlait. Cloeva in his book Luculus, Itah that their were twice Confuls. Which also is apparant by the Captoll and Sicilian tables: in which their furnames are to be feen, Geminus 11, and Contall,

L. Cacilius. N. Fabino.

T is recorded by Collisioners, that the Confuls of this year, were Li Caciline and N. Fabis, we but London to mandet them, Caciline Mereis lus, and Numerius Fabius. Cultivitain Ralender and the Sicilian Registers, have them in this manner; Mesellus II. and Buteo II. But the capitoline tables show them thus, L. Cacilius Metellus II. N. Fabius Buteo II. Pliny also reported in his seventh book, that Metellus was twice Conful.

M'. Fabins. M'.Opacilins.

C. Affiodories fetteth down as Confuls, M. Fabins and M. Osseilius. The Sicilian Regifiets, Craffus and Licinius. Gollius in his senth book and fat chaptes, hath F. Licinius and Oracilius Craffus. The capitol marble flowes, M. Fabius Licinius, and M. Osacibius Craffus. Befides, Gellius in the place before alledged, Florus likewife in his 10 Breyiary upon Livius maketh mention of their Confuls; as also Supposius in Tiberius.

M. Fatins. C. Atolius.

C Affedores, reckeineth M. Fabrus, and C. Asilius, Confuls for this year. The Stellian tables, Bures and Bulbus. But those of the capitol, M. Fabrus Butso, and C. Asilius Bulbus, Qt Fabrus the Confuls shipwische, Florus speaketh out of the nineteenth book of Lives.

A. Manlius. C. Sempronius.

FOr this years Couliuls, Callindorat letreth forth unto us, A Mantini and C. Semprodus, The Stillian ecouls, Torquinis and Bafus, Co. Symptomia book thath Kitlers and Bafus, The captainte abilish the could be a Mantini Trajuntus Astronian, and C. Semprodus Bistus II.

C.Fundamus. G.Sulpinius.

Mitaliani pittretti ulokun G. Pundamini. Add
C. Sulpinius Add Cultais. The Stilling wiltess, Fundalus and Gallas. The Capitol monuments, C. Fundanius Fundalus, and C. Sulpisius Gallas, None befides make mention of them,

C.Lutatin: Catelm. A. Poftumius.

CAffiodorus delivereth unto us for Consuls this year, C. Lucatus and A. Postumus. The Sicilian records, Casulus and Albinus. Entropius, and the capitol marbles, C. Lucatus Casulus, and A. Postumius Albinus.

Q. Lutatius Cerco. A. Manlius.

C. Associate, Europius, and Orosius, shew for consults this year, Q. Lusaius, and A. Mantius. The Sicilian records, Cereo and Torquaus. They of the capitol, Q. Lusaius Cereo, and Au. Maulius Terquaus Assicus 11. Indeed C. Lutaius Gereo, is named for an Embassador by Loys in his 42 book.

C.Claudius Centho. M.Sempronius.

FOr this year there were Confuls, C. Claudius Centho, and M. Sempronius Tudstanus, according to Caffedows and the capitol writers. The Sicilian records tedify also the fame furnames. Of these confuls likewise, besides the capitol Writers, Cierospeaketh in his Caso and Brussa, where he calleth this year (according to the judgment of Attiens, where Prave also agreeth) the 514 year from the soundation of the city; as also in his first Tusculan question. So doth Gellius 17 book 21 chap. and Cassionus.

C. Mamilius, Q.Valerius,

NExt there followed in confuls place, as witneffeth Caffiodorus, C. Mamili... and Q. Valerius: but according to the Sicilian registers, Turrinus and Falco: and after the capitol records, C. Mamilius Turrinus, and Q. Valerius Falco. Befides, Verrius: Flacous and Caffiodorus, Gellius allo maketh mention of the Coff, in his 17 book and 21 chapter, So doth Cierro in Brains and the Tuf. ulan questions, in which year they say, that Ensianthe Poet was born.

T. Sempronius. P. Valerius.

For the year following, Caffiedor's: hath confuls, T. Sempronius and P. Valerius. Gracebus and Paleo, in Cuspinians Kalender and the Scillian retords. Zenara avoucheth, Semp. Gracebus, and P. Valerius. The capitol writers, have T. Sempronius Gracebus, and P. Valerius Faleo. Orofius speaketh of these confuls.

L. Cornelius, 517 Q. Fulvini, 10 Confuls, L. Cornelius and Q. Fulvini, 20-

narins, L. Lentolus and O. Flacens, Emropsias, L. Carnellus Londilus, and O. Flacens, the facels. The capitol registers give to Lentilus, the furname Candenus!, and therefore in Cashinian Kalender, they stand by the maries of Candilus and Flacens. As for the Sicilian registers, they leave them out clean.

C.Licenius. P.Cornelius.

C. Assistant Peterships, C. Liscinias and P. Cornelius, Zonaras, P. Lentalus and Licinias Varus. The capitoline witters, C. Licinias Varus, and P. Cornelius Lentalus Candinus. In like manner Conformus: who reckoneth this for the 518 year after the cities foundations following hereinthe computation of Varus, Coero, and Pling, Cuspins in Kalender and the Scillian registers, name them Claudius and Varus.

7. M. nlius Torquatus. C. Atilius.

This year had for confuls, as Cassadornia saith, T. Mantina Torquatus, and C. Attisus. The Sicilian records, shew Torquatus and Bulbus: but Entropius, Orosus, and the capical Tables shew, T. Mantins Torquatus, and C. Aritius Bulbus: unto Bulbus The capitol records put to the numeral note II. When T. Mantins Torquatus and C. Aritius Eulbus the second time were cost. according to Verrius Flacens, Eutropius, Orosus, and Cassadorne, and that there was peace throughout all the empire of Rome, the Temple of Jamus was that the second time, as Plusarch sheweth in Nama: as Livy also, Vessius, Entropius, and Orosi, as, do cestify.

L. Postumius. Sp. Carvilius.

CAffiodorus nameth for confuls this year, I. Flymins and Sp. Carvilius. The Sicilian Regitters have Albanus and Ruga. Zonara, Pofrumius Albanus, and Sp. Carvalius. The capitol writers have I. Pofrumius Albinus, and Sp. Carvalius Maximus. That Ruga was a furname to the Carviliu, appeareth out of Gellius, who maketh mention of Sp. Carvalius Ruga, who at this time was the first that divorced his wife.

Q. Fabius. M'. Pompenius.

Chillodorus putteth down for confuls, Q. Fabins and M. Pomponius. The Sicilian records Maximus and Matho. The capitoline writers have Q. Fabius Maximus Verrucojus, and M. Pomponius Matho. Zonaras hath Q. Fabius Max. and M. Pomponius. The furname of Maximus, this Fabius took of his grand-father, and was not himself the first of that name, whatfoever Polybius writeth in his third book, Ferrncofus he was called belides of a west upon his lip, at Plut arch witnesseth, and he that wrote the treatile of Famous men.

M. Lepidus. M. Poplicius.

Arcus Lepidus and M. Poplicius are reputed to be Confuls this year by Caffiodorus. The Sicilian regifters have Lepidus and Malleolus. Zonarus hath M. Malleolus and M. Emplius. The capitol tables shew M. Emplius Lepidus and M. Poplicius.

C.Papirius 523 M. Pomponius.

NExt after this were created Confuls, C. Papivius and M. Pomponius according to Cafflodorus, Zonarus, and Dionyfus in his fecond book. The Sicilian registers fhew Mafo and Matho. But the Capitol records have C. Papirius Mafo and M. Pomponius Matho. Of C. Papirius, (On of C. furnamed Mafo, a Pontify or Bifhop, Livy speaketh in the year 540,

M. Emylius. M. Junius.

Onaras and Cassiodorus exhibit unto us for Confuls, M. Emplius and M. Junius. The Sicilian registers, Barbula and Pera. The Capitol records, M. Emplius Barbula and M. Junius, Pera.

L. Postumius. 525 Cn. Fulvins.

Affiodorus fetteth down L. Possumius and Cn. Eukvius as Consuls. The Sicilian records Albinus and Centumalus. But those of the Capitol, and Eutropius, present unto us L. Possumius Albinus and Cn. Fulvius Centumatus. Polybius nameth (n. Fulvius and A. Possumius.

Q. Fabius II, Sp. Carvilius,

There are by Coffiederas nominated for Confuls this year; Qu. Fabius Maximus the second time, and Sp. Garvillus. The Sicilian regifers Maximus and Ruga. The Capitol writers fet also unto Carvillus Maximus the mark and numeral note of a double Confulhip. Ciero in his book entituled Care, likewise in his second book of Rhetorical invention, maketh mention of these Confuls, and so doth Valerius in his chapter, disconsing of the kindnes and affectionate duty of children to their parents.

P.Valerius M. Atilius.

These are set down by Cossistatorus for Cossistinis year, P. Valerius and M. Atilius. The Sicilian registers, have Flaceus and Regulus, The Capitol records repretent P. Vaterias Placeus, and M. Atilius Regular, Gellius writeth of them in his 4 book and 3 chapter.

L. Apustius. M.Valerius.

NExt after, Cassisdorus potteth L. Apostius and M. Valerius Consuls, The Sicilian tables Maximus and Apostius. The Capitol monuments L. Apostius Fullo, and M. Valer, Messula

C. Atilius. L. Aemilius.

I Mmediatly followed Confuls, C. Arilius and L. Emplus, as Caffichorus and Polybius do wines: whom the Capicol writers call, C. Arilius Regulus, and L. Emplus Papes, The Sicilian registers, Regulus and Papes, Zonaras, Regulus and Emplus, Of these Confuls also Orosius maketh mention: and Plum in his third book and twentieth chapter, where untruly men read Paulus for Papes.

T. Manlins. Q. Fulvius II.

The year following had Confuls T. Manling and Q. Fulvins the fecond time, according to Colfodorus and Polybins, and as Orofus faith, T. Manling Torquasus and Q. Fulvins Flaceus, Culpinians tables, together with the Capitoline, have Torquasus the fecond time, and Flaceus, likewife the fecond time, shewing the furnames only of their Cosf.

C. Flaminius. P. Furius Philus.

C. Associated and the control of the M.Marcellus Cn. Cornelius.

Caffiodorus nameth for the next Confuls, M. Marcellus and Cn. Cornelius. Pol·bius, M. Claudius and Cn. Cornelius. The Sicilian registress copie and Marcellus. Zonarus. Claudius Marcellus and Cn. Scipio. Eutropius, M. Claudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio. The Capitius Scipio Alcundius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio Calour. This is that Marcellus, who was five times Conful: and this is that Scipio was flain in Spain by Afarubat the Carthaginian.

P. Cornelius M. Minutius.

C Affodorus sheweth for this years Confuls?
C or nelius and M. Minusius, So doth Zongrus. The Sicilian registers have Scipio and Russus. Entropius hath P. Cornelius and M. Minimus Russus. Cuspinians book Asina and Russus. Signing and Onsphring both, do think that this P. Cornelius Scipio Asina was his fon, who in the fift Punick war was twice consul. And verily Livy, in the year 543 maketh mention of P. Cornelius Asina, an honorable Senator, and who had been consul.

L. Veturius. 534

Caffiodorus and Zonaras exhibit unto us for Confuls, L. Veturius and C. Lutatius. The Sicilian registers Philo and Catulus. Caspinians book Philo and Secoola.

M. Levius. L. Emylius.

The confuls next following were M. Divins and L. Emplus, as Cafeborus witnefieth, Cuffinians book and the Greek records flew Salinetor and Paulus. Zonarus, M. Livius and Emplus Paulus. Pliny maketh mention of these confuls in the 29 book and fift chapt.

P.Cornelius Scipio. T.Sempronius Longus.

C. Associate and Polybius put down for coniuls P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius. Zonara, Sempronius Longus and P. Seipio. The Sicilian records, Longus and Scipio. Livy, Eutropius, Probus, Orosau, and Pedianus, name them P. Cornelius Scipio, and T. Sempronius Longus., Whiles these were consuls, the second Punick war arose, as writers have delivered unto us in their chronicles.

Cn. Servilius Geminus. C.Flaminius.

THen followed confuls, as Polybius, Callindo. rus, and Livy write, Cn, Servilius, together with C. Flaminius. But the two last named, as also the Sicilian registers, have given to Servilius the furname of Geminus. C. Flaminius now fecond time conful, with like pride as heretofore, entered into his magistracy in the Ides of March not at Rome but at Ariminum. The same man, in neglect and contempt of the Auspicia or figns of birds, at what time as he made head and went against Annibal coming into Italy, fought a battel at the lake Thrafymenus, where his army was wholly defeated and himfelf loft his life : into whose place M. Atilius Regulus, who had been conful before, was fubflitured. Thus much out of Livy and Polybins.

538 C. Terentius Varro. L. Emzlius Panlus.

NExt to them Polybius bringeth in L. Rmylius and C. Terentius for confuls. The Sicilian tegisters, Pacius and Varro, Plutarch in Panius, Terentins Varro, and Kenylius Paulus, Livy, Calliedorus, and others, C. Terenius Varro, and L. Emylius Paulus, Gelizahus noteth, that the father of C. Terenius Varro, Was one Aulus, a thing by others passed over.

L. Posthumius Albinus, III.
M.Claudius Marcellus, II.
Q. Fabius Maximus, III.
T. Sempronius Gracchus,

I Juy reporteth that the confuls elect for this year, when M. Junius the Dictator held the folemn affembly for the election, were Lucius Posthumius Albinus the third time, who as then ruled the province of Ganl, and T. Sempronius Gracchus, who had been master of the horsemen: and that Posthum us before that he entred into government, was by Annibal in France environed and flain, in whose flead M. Marcellus was subrogated conful now the second time: who upon information given by the Augurs. that hiscreation was not good, refigned: and commonly the Nobles gave out and faid, That the Gods were not well pleased, that two commoners were then first chosen consuls: whereupon in the room of Marcellus, Quintus Fabius Maximus was chosen consul the third time. Thus write Livy and Plurisch, And for this cause it is that Cassiodorus, Orosius, and Entropins do put down for this years confuls, T. Sempronius and Q. Fabius.

Q. Fabius, IV. M. Claudius Marcellus, III.

Livy, Plutarch, and Caffiedorus, fet out for confuls this year, Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and M. Claudeus Marcellus the third time. Moreover, Cicro offentimes and Frontinus in his fecond book of stratagems, make mention of these confuls.

Q. Fabius Max. son of Verrucosus. T. Sempronius Gracchus. II.

A Gainst this year were both the consuls created in their absence, namely, Q, Fab, Max, the son of Vertuce/sa, and T. Sempronius Gracebus the second time: as Livy testifieth and Caffiodorus, tegether with the Sicilian registers. This Fabius had been Pretor the former year: and Gracebus consult two years before. These consuls Gellius nominatesh our of Quadrigations, the second book and second chapter, Likewise Gicro and Valerius, App. Claudius Pulcher. Q. Fulvius Flaceus, III.

The confuls created for this year by the Dichator, were Quinnus Fulcus Flaccus the third time, who then was master of the horfemen, and Appins Claudens Fulcher, who is his his pretorship was L. deputy in Sicily, as Livy, Phatarch in Fabius, Castodorus, and Fefins in his 17 book do witness.

C. Sulpitius Galba. Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.

Pon the receit of certain letters, the Coniuls agreed together; that Claudius should hold the election for magistrate and see in fanished, whiles Fubius remained still before Capua. Claudius created for confuls, Cn. Fubums Centumalus, and P. Sulpitius son of Servims, and surnamed Galba, who before time had bern no state-office of the chair. Thus writeth Livius. The same clinks also Capubash of the chair. The switch deliver. Orosus likewise and Festus in his 17 book. The Sicilian records declare Galba and Centumash. As for S. Sulpitius, he is named in his second consulship, asit appeareth upon record in the capitol, the son of Ser, nephew of Publius surnamed Galba Maximus,

M.Val.Lavinus. II. M. Claudius Marcellus. IV.

I Ivy, Sextus Pompeius, Valerius Maximus, Plutarch, Florus, Eutropias, and Orofius, do prefent for confuls this year, M. Claudius Marcellus and M. Valerius Lavinus. Now this is Marcellus his fourth confulfhip, as Plutarch and Livy write : but Caffiodorus faith, that he was but the third time with M. Valerius Lavinus, leaving out that confulfhip which he bare not through, because of the errour in his creation: and yet is it one of the five that he is reported to have born. Livy in the nine and twentieth and thirtieth books, writerh that M. Valerius was twice conful. In like manner, the book of Cashinian hath for this year, Marcellus the fourth time. and Lavinus the second time. And therefore Omphrius supposeth that his first consular was in the year five hundred four-and-thirty? and his fecond, now. Of him Polybius and Cicero make mention.

He confuls for this year created, were Q. Fabina the fift time, and Q. Fabina Harden the fourth time, the fame man who being, Dictator, held the affembly for that election; as Livy and Cafficdorus do witnes. The Sicilian records fer forth Fabins and Placeus. Whiles these were consuls, Cicero in his Oration against Rullus, faith that Capua was, won: and yet Livy hath reported it two years before, Of these consuls Valerius also, together with Planarch, Emropius, and Orofius hard made mention.

M. Clardins Marcellus, P.
T. Quintius Crispinus.

IN the eleventh year of the Punick war, there entred into their confulfing M. Marcellus the fix time (6 by ereckon that confulfing which upon an error in the creation he kept not) and T. Quintius Criftinus. So saith Livy. Plutareh allo nameth Marcellus the fift time and Criftinus. But Cassiodorus reckoneth Marcellus but the fourth time with Criftinus, passing over that sally confular of his. Moreover these consuls are mentioned by Cicero Valerius, Plinius the yonger, Probus, Eutropius, and Orofius who also report that they both were forelaid and intrapped in ambush by Amshali in so much as Marcellus was presently slain in the place, and Quintius sted fore wounded,

C.Claudius Nero. M.Livius Salinasor.

Then the LL, of the Senat cast about to see whom they should create confuls, behold, the most eminent and singular man above all others, was C. Canadius Nerounto whom was joined as companioning overnment M. Evipuss, who many years before, upon a consular that he had born, was by the judgment of the people condemned; and almost eight years after his condemnation was by Marcus Maycellus, and Marcus Livius them consuls, reduced into the city. In like manner, the Sicilian Registers namefor consuls, Nero, and Salmator. The caption seconds shew Caime Clandius Nero, with M. Livius Salinator.

Q.Cacilius Metellus, L.Veturius Philo.

Allabrogicus, brother of Scipio, who was the son of this Fabius.

610 Ser. Galba. L. Aurelius.

His year had for Confuls, Ser. Galba and Lu. Aurelius, according to Coffiodorus: those, Palerius in his fixt book nameth S. Sulpitius Galba, and Lu. Aurelius Cotta, whom the Sicilian catalogue sheweth under the bare names of Galba and Cotta. But the capitol fragments have Galba and L. Valerins Cotta. This is that Sulp Galba, who being Pretor, as Suetonius writeth stirred up the war before against Viriatas for he was a vehement Orator of whom Cicero speaketh many times. And as for L. Cotta, he it was whom afterwards being accused by Africanus, Qu. Metellus Macedonicus defended, Cicero in Bruins for Murena and against Verres, maketh mention of him Likewife Framinus of them both in his first book of water-conduits. Xxxx

Ap. Claudius. Q. Metellus.

CAssiders nameth for this years Consuls Appins Claudius and Q. Metellus. Orosius, App. Claudius and Qu. Cacitius Metellus. The Sicilian registers have Claudius and Motellus. The capitol fragments shew Pulcher and Q. Cacitius Macedonicus. Of the same, Frontinus speaketh in his book of water-conduits, and Valerius in his seventh book. Now this Metellus is he who being Peteor, subdued the Macedonicus: whom Plinies 7 book sheweth to be the son of Lu, and nepseuwo Quin.

L. Metellus. Q. Maximus.

CAssolves putteth down for Consuls, Le. Macellus and Q. Maximus. The Sicilian records Me. ellus and Maximus. Orossus, L. Cecilius Metallus and Q. Fabius Maximus. Serviliamus. In like maner the capitol fragments Calous and Serviliamus. This Serviliamus is the brother german of Q. Servilius Capia, the Consul-two years after (as witnesseth Appian) and the adopted fon of Q. Fabius Maximus; so they were both adopted by Q. Fabius Max, the son of Vertucosus, the one out of the house Emplia, the other of Servilia. I. Metallus is the brother of Q. Matellus Macedonium, as writeth Valerius in his treasite of Witnesses.

Cn. Capio. 613 Q.Pompeius.

Confuls by Caffiodorm. Velleius in his fecond book faith thus: Whether there were two or three houses of the Pemperes, the first of that name was Conful with Cn. Servilius. Of this Q. Pompeius, Cicero maketh mention oftentimes, writing that he was of base and obscure parentage. Him Valerius in his chapter of witnesses nameth Aufidus, but corruptly through the fault of the copiers, in flead of An.F.i. the fon of Aulus. In the same fort Appianus in Hi-Spanensis nameth him Qu. Pompeius Aulus for A. Filius, Cicero in his Orations against Verres, and in that for Fonteius, Valerius also in his chapter of Witnesses, sheweth that there were two brethren named Cneus and Quintus, both Servilii Capiones.

Capio. C.Lalins.

A Fter this were Consuls made, Qu. Capio and Co. Ladius, my authors are Cofficial and Obfequent together with the Sicilian tables, and Frontinus in his treatife of water-conduits, This Ladius as Gieso in his eleventh Philippick, and Velleins do report, was the fon of Ladius the the Consul, anno 564, whom as Cieco in his fecond book of Duties and in Ladius, was the firth that was furnamed Wife, whereof Plus arch in Graechy yeeldeth a reason.

Cn. Piso. M. Popilins.

Cassioderus theweth for this years Coniuls, co. Pijo with M. Poplius. Appianus and the Epitomit have M. Poplius Lexas: but they be samed M. Poplius Lexas: but they be samed M. Poplius Lexas and L. Caspunius to Valerius in his fift book, writing thus, That Cornelius Hispalus, Lord chief justice for stangers, when M. Poplius Lexas and L. Caspunius were Coniuls, by an edict commanded all the Chaldzan [Astrologers] to depart out of Rome and Iraly within ten daies next ensuing.

P. Scipio. D. Brutus.

Publius Scipio and D. Brutus are named for this years Coss. by Cossidorus, Florus in his 55 Epitome; P. Cornelius Nafice (inrnamed Serapion in mockery by C. Curiatius a Trib. of the Com.) and D. Junius Brutus Coff, levied and mustered fouldiers &c. This Scipio was fon of that Nafica who was furnamed Corculum, and twice was he Conful and Cenfor alfo, nephew to that Nafica, who by the Senat was deemed the best man in the City, and father to him that warred upon Ingartha, as Velleins faith. This Decius Bruins, Cicero in his Bruins calleth the fon of Marcus, who bare the Confulfhip in the year five hundred ninety feven. and in the capitol tables is called Pennus. Moreover, of these Consuls Cicero speaketh very oft. Valerias also in his 3 book, chap. 7. 5 book. chap. 3. 9 book, chap. 1 5: Likewife, Pliny in his 21 book, and lastly, Frantinus.

M. Emplius. C. Hostilius Mancinus.

C Affiodorus and Obsequens match togetherin the consulting this year, M. Emplins, and C. Hossilius Mancinus. The Sicilian registers Lepidus and Mancinus. Grossus and Appian, M. Emplius Lepidus and C. Hessilius Mancinus. Of this Consult Mancinus there remain yet some tokens to be seen in broken marbles of the capitol. Cicero maketh mention often-times of Lepidus, as well in other places as in Brusu. Likewise, Valerius, Florus, Patereulus, and Plinj in his treatile of Famous men.

P.Furius. Sex. Attilius Serranus.

Caffiodorus putteth down for Confuls, P. Furius and Sex. Astilius Serramus. Cicero in his hird book of Duties, L. Furius and Sex. Astilius, Objequens, L. Furius and Antijus Serramus. The Sicilian regifters Philus and Serramus. Of tills Furius, Occes writeth thus in his Brutus; I.k.
Furius, Philus, was reputed for a man of very good language, and to have spoken more learnedly than others. In the capitol fragments there appeareth yet some shew of Serramus the Conful.

619 Ser. Fulvius. C. Calpurnius.

The next confuls are fet down by Cassindarium. The Sicilian catalogue hath Flucus and Q.C. alparnius. The Sicilian catalogue hath Flucus and Pso. Orofius nameth S. Fatevins Flacus and Q. Cassindarius Pso. The capitol fragments thew Pso: as for Fulumis Flacus the Conful, mention there is made of him in the Epitome 36. Appian also in his Illyrica speaks of him, and in Hispanensh of Cass.

620 P: Africanus. C.Fulvius Flaccus.

The year following had P. Africanus and C. Fulvius Flaceus for Coll as it is written in Cofficial and Objequents, But Scipio and Flaceus, in the Sicilian catalogue. The fame Flaceus the Capitol fragments of hew. Of this C. Fulvius, mention there is made also in the 56 Epitomes and of Africanus twice consulty Appian in Hispanensis, by Orosius, Florus, and Valerius in his sught book.

P. Mucius. L. Calparnius.

This year had confuls, P. Mucins, and Lu. Calpurnins, as witneffeth Caffiodorus. The Sicilian registers shew Scavota and Calpurnius. Velleius nameth P. Mucius Scavola and L. Calpurnius. Of these Consuls Padianus upon the Orations against Verres, maketh mention in these words: Scavola a right learned man in the Laws, was conful with L. Pifo, that year wherein Tib. Oracchus was killed. In the broken marbles of the capitol he standeth by the name of L. Calpurnius Pilo furnamed also Fruoi and that truly. For Cicero in one Oration against Verres and in another for Fonteius writeth that he was the first of the Pilones, called Frugi, This man, when he was Tribune or Provost of the Commons, made a law against the extortion of magiftrats, when Martins and Manilius were confuls : he wrote also the annals of Rome, as Cicero testifieth in his book Brutus.

P. Popilius. P. Rupilius.

A Gainst this year were consuls created, as Cassiodorus writeth, P. Popilius and P. Repilius: After the Sicilian records Lansa and Rupilius. Cicero traketh mention of them in his 13 book of Epsilies to Assicus, and against Perpilius. Also in the capitol fragments we fixed of P. Popilius, Son of Caius, and P. Rupilius son of P. and nephew of Publius. Velleius in his second book, nameth the consuls Rupilius and Popilius. Cicero in Lasius speaketh of Rupilius and Lansa. And of P. Rupilius there is mention made in the Epitome or Breviary 59.

P. Craffus. L. Valerius

Affiodoras putteth down for confuls this year, Pub. Craffus and Lu. Valerous, Craffus and Flacewithe Sicilian catalogue. L. Valerini Flacens and Pub, Licinius Crassus, according to Cicero in his eleventh Philippick against Antony. Of this conful Pu. Licinius Craffus, all they have spoken, who wrote of the war of Aristonicus. This P. Craffus furnamed Dives, by Cicero in his books of a perfect Orator, and in Brutus is called the brother of Scavola: whereupon Volleius in his fecond book nameth him Mutianus, betokening thereby that he was adopted out of the house of Matitinto the family of the Crasi. This man Gellius writeth in his first book and 23 chapt. to have been of all others the richest man, the noblest personage, and the most eloquent Orator, the deepelt lawyer, and the fupream Bishop withal,

C. Claudius. M. Perpenna.

A Ppius Claudius and M. Perpenna are matched in the Consular together this year by Obsequens and Cassiodorus. Cuspinians book and the Greek records, thew Lentulus and Perpenna. This Claudius haply was adopted into the family of the Cornelii. Moreover, Cicero in his third book of Laws, and in the Oration for Plancius, calleth this man C. Claudius. This also is confirmed by an old table of stone common-Ty known, wherin is to be feen this infeription. C. Claudius and M. Perpenna Coff. Which evidence Sigonius and Onuphrius following, named him C.Claudius and not Appires. Of this M. Perpenna as many as wrote the war of Aristonicus, have made mention, and namely, Valerius in his 3 book and 4 chapt, Velleins, Strabo Orofius, and Eutropius.

C.Sempronius. M. Aquilius.

THis year had consuls, M. Agnilius and C. Sempronius, as witnesseth Cassiodorus. But Aquilius and Tuditanus according to the Sicilian registers. C. Sempronius Tuditanus, and M. Aquilius, after Orosius. Gieero speaketh of them in his book of the nature of gods, and to his brother Quinnus. Paterusius also in his second book. Strabo in his 14 book. Appian in his first book. And both of them are taken out of the triumbh records in the capitol.

626 Cn. Octavius. T. Annius.

NExt followed as confuls Cn. Ottavius and T. Amius, at Cafindarus tellifieth and none but he. For Cafpinians book and the Sicilian catalogue have Ottavius and Rufus, Pierwch alfo writeth, that one T. Amius contended with Tib. Gracchus in a fedition, As for this C. OttaXXXX 2 vies, vim, fon he was to that Cneus who was Conful in the year five hundred eighty nine.

L. Cassins, L. Cinna.

CAssionant nameth for this years Consuls, L. Cassius and L. Cinna. The Sicilian records Longinus and Cinna. Cassinian sooks set out Rulla, corsuptly for Revilla, and Cinna. This L. Cassius was his son who bare the consulthip in the year 590, and he was afterwards Censor in the year 520 surnamed Ravilla by Frontinus.

628 M. Emylius. L. Aurelius.

C. Assiodorus and Obsequents reckon for Cossentia year, Mar. Emylius and Lu. Aurelius. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Lepidus and Orestes. Cenforinus hat M. Emylius Lepidus, and L. Aurelius Orestes. Cicero in Brutus, Mar. Lepidus, and L. Orestes.

M. Plantius. M. Fulvius.

C. Association and Obsequent avouch Consuls this year, M. Plantins and M. Fulvins. The Sicilian registers, Hypsens and Flacous. Orosius and Frontins in his treatise of water-conduites, M. Plantins Hypsens and Mar. Fulvins Flacous. Valerius also in his discourse of Pride maketh mention of them.

C. Cassius Longinus. C. Sextius.

CAfsiodorus and Objequens report, that the confuls following were C. Cafsins Longinus, and C. Sextins. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Longinus and Calvinus. Vellens writeth, that the colony Fabrateria was planted by Cafsins and Calvinus. Cierro in Bruns speaketh of C. Sextins Calvinus. Entropius declareth for confuls. C. Caffins Longinus, and S. Domitius Calvinus, not without suffiction of a fault or errour.

Q.Cacilius. T. Quintius.

Afflodorus mominateth for confuls this year, Q. Cacilius and T. Quintins, The Sicilian records Metellus and Flaminius, Eutropius and Orofius, Q. Cacilius Metellus and T. Quintins Flaminius, Gicero in his Oration pleading for his house, calleth them T. Flaminius and Q. Metellus, This Q. Metellus was the eldest of the four fons of Macedonieus, whom Plutarch in his treatife of the Romans fortune, calleth Q. Metellus Balearieus, of the Baleares whom in this magistracy he conquered.

Cn. Domitius. C. Fannius.

C. Fannius. The Sicilian records, Enobarbus and C. Fannius. The Sicilian records, Enobarbus and Fannius. Cicero writeth of them in his Brutus, and Pliny in his fecond book and 32 chapter. Three moons (qd, he) appeared when Cn, Domitius and C, Fannius were Coss, which most men called the night-stars.

L. Opimius. 633 Q. Maximus.

This year had for confuls, Lu. Opinius and Q. Maximus, as witnesseth Coffiodorus. The Sieilian catalogue fheweth Opimius and Maximus. But Oblequens, L. Opinius and Qu. Fabius Maximus. Pliny speaketh of them in his second book, faying, About the fun there appeared an arch or bow, when L. Opimius and Q. Fabius were consuls. This Qu. Fabius Maximus is by Cicero in Brutus, Florus in his Epitome, Velleius in his 2 book, and Padianus upon the Orations against Verres, rightly named the nephew of Paulus, and fon of F. Emylianus. And fo may Strabo, Appean, and Pliny be well reproved, for making him and his father Æmylianus, all one. The fame man, as Cicero and Pliny teftify, was furnamed Allobrogicus, upon a victory over the Allobroges. Of this L. Opimius conful, after whose name there was a wine called Opinianum, Pliny maketh mention in his 14 book and 4 chap. Plutarch also in C. Gracchus, and Velleius in his fecond book.

P. Manlius. C: Papyrius.

C Assiodorus inferreth for this years consuls, Manlius and C. Papyrus. The Siciliance cords Manlius and Carbo. This is that Caius Papyrius Carbo, who being a Tribune of the commons when Claudius and Perpenna were Cossi. was afterwards by C. Graechus appointed for one of the Triumvis to divide lands: who first took part with the commons, but afterwards ranged with the nobility: of whom Coere in many other places, and namely, in his second book of a perfect Orator, maketh mention.

L. Cacilius. L. Aurelius.

C. Afsisdors and Obsequent pulldown for contilian catalogue, Metellus and Lu. Aurelius, The Sinlian catalogue, Metellus and Cotta. Plus archin Marins speaketh of C. Matellus and Cotta, confuls. Which Marins he writeth to have born the Tribunship of the commons, when these were consuls, and to have cast Metellus the consuls into prison. This is that Cotta, in whose consular room Velleius reporteth, that C. Casar Flamin of Junger, was created.

M Cato. 636 Q. Martins.

THis year had for confuls Mar. Cato and Q. Martins: winnels Cafflodorus and Objecten. Cate and Martins, according to the Sicilian regifiers. But Europius: nament them M. Porcius Cato and Q. Martins, Valerius speaken.

of them in his fift book, and Pliny in his fecond book 31 chap. Gelline also in his 13 book and 19 chape.

L. Lucillas. 637 Q. Manne.

Confuls next entuing by Caffinderus his fayine were L. Cacains and Q. Musius, After the Sicilian regifiers, Metellus and Scavola if ye go by Entrepens, L. Cacilias Metellus and Q. Mattus Scavola, Now is this that L. Cacilius Merellas, who afterwards upon subduine the Dalmatians, was furnamed Dalmaticus, whom Plusarch in Coriolanus and in his book of the Roman fortune, nameth Diademains, for that a long time he bound up his forehead with a frontlet or wreath which they cal a diadem to hide an ulcer that he had there. Hereupon, when Pompeius bound up his leg with a white band or parter. It makes no matter, ed. Favonius, in what part of the body aman weareth the diadem : upbraiding and reproching him for his Kinglike power, in terming a small cloue or peece of cloth by that name. This is that Q.Mutins Scavela the Augur, of whom Cicero in his book Lalins, and in the first book of an Orator maketh mention.

> 638 C.Licinius Geta, Q.Maximut,

C Affinderus coupleth together in fociety of Conjulition this year, C. Licinius and Qu. Maximus. The Sicilian registers name them Geta and Eburinus. Ofthis Q.Maximus Cicero Speaketh in his Oration for Marana. That this man was of the house of the Fabii, his furnamed Eburinus sheweth, of whom writeth Feft wi in this manner: Qu. Fabins was called Pullus Touis, furnamed Eburinus, of whiteness, for that his buetock was blafted with lightning. Quintilian in his third Declamation reporteth, that this Fab. Eburenus had a fon unchaft of his body, whom he examined at home in his house, and thereupon pur him to death. The same man Valerius calleth Qu. Fabins Servilianus. As forshe name of this Licinius his father, obscure and onknown heretofore, Geltzins out of an old antiquity of coin hath restored it, wherein, as he faith, was written plainly, C. Licinius Gara, son of Publius.

M. Metellus. M. Scaurns.

The confuls nextfollowing by Coffidors, his report, were M, Metellus and M, Seassus, As for Metellus, the third (on he was to Macedoniems. But as touching M, Seassus, thus writeth Pedasium, M, Seassus, thus writeth Pedasium, M, Seassus (qd, he) was a Patritian indeed and of noble blood, but fo, as the gentry of his house, for those diffects before him by obfure, for neither tather, nor grandfire, by reason of their poor estate, and for want of putting forth themselves in the world, attained to dignity in wealpublick. Moreover, of him Cicero maketh mention of sentimes in his Oration for Moreovand in Britus. Kalertus alio in his 5 book and 8 chapt. and Pliny likewise in his aback and 36 chapt.

M'. Acilius Bathus. C. Care.

CAffiodorus fetteth down for confuls this year, M. Atilius Balbus, and C. Cato. The Sicilian catalogue Balbus, and C. Cato. The Sicilian catalogue Balbus, and C. Coto. Obleguens M. Acilius and C. Portins. Of the fame confuls Pliny speaketh in the 2 book, chap. 29, and 58. Platerch in Marius giveth to Acilius the forename Manus. This C. Cata is the brother of that M. Cato, who four years before was Conful, nephew to M. Cato Conformus, and Africanus filters son, as faith Velleins, Ciemo against Verzes, and in Bruths.

C. Cacilias. Cn. Pappinas.

Affiodorus and Obsequens set down for next Confuls, C. Cacilias and Cu. Papyrius. The Sicilian registers Metellus and Carbo, Entropius, C. Cacilius Metellus, and Cn. Carbo. The same men Tacum in his book of the manners of Germans reported to have born the Confulship, anno 640 after the foundation of Rome: in which year, both he and Obsequens do reports that the people of Rome began first to war with the Cimbrians and the Tentones. This C. Metellas was the fourth fon of C. Metellas the fon of Macedonicus: whom, when he died, he left a man of Pretors calling, and in fuit and election for to be Conful. This mangat a forname by way of reproach, as Cicero testifieth in his fecond book of a perfect Orator. Now furnamed was he Capriarus, as Plutarch faith in the Life of the Romans.

642 M.Livins Drulus. L. Pilo.

CAffiodorus exhibiteth unto us for this years Confuls, M. Livius Drufas and L. Pifo. The Sicilian catalogue Drufus and Pifo. L. Pifo furnamed Cafonius a man of Confular degree, was flain after by the Tiguris, when Lu. Caffius was Conful, as Qrofus refilieth.

P. Scipio. L. Calpurnius Bestia:

Affiodorus namesh this year for Consuls, P. Sepio and L. Calpuraius Befra. The Sicilian records Nafica and Befra. Oblequent, Pub. Serio and L. Calpuraius, Sahih, Europpia, and Orofius, P. Serio Nafica and L. Calpuraius Befra. Of these Consuls, P. Nafica Serio and L. Befray-feries likewise makesh report, lib. 1. chap. 6. Moscover. Cierce in his Bernes writeth that P. Serpis the Gon of Pub. Serios surfaced Serajous and tellow Consult to L. Leftia, died in his Confullation of the Series them of Serajous and tellow Consult to L. Leftia, died in his Confullation of the Series them of Serajous and tellow Consult to L. Leftia, died in his Confullation of the Series than the Series in the Series Series in the Series Series Confullation of the Series than the Series Series in the Series Series Series in the Series Seri

5p. Posthumius. M. Minntins.

C Afficatorus fetteth down for Confuls, Sp. Poffhumius and M. Minustus. The Sicilian registers Abinus and Refus. Salufs, Sp. Albinus and Q. Minustus Refus. Of M. Minustus, Veltina and the threefcore and seventh Epitome make mention.

645 Q. Metellus M. Silanus

C. Afsiodorus faith that the Confuls next following were Q. Mesellus and M. Silamus. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Mesellus and Silamus. Padianus and Europius., Q. Cacilius Mesellus Numidicas, and M. Junius Silamus. Of them also Cierro speaketh in Brusus. This Mesellus was surnamed Numidicus for the conquest of Numidia, as witnesseth Velleius.

Ser. Galba. M. Scaurus.

CAssindarys and Obsequents deliver for the Contills of this year, Servite Galba and M. Seathrat. The Sicilian evidences, Suspirus and M. Seathrat. The Sicilian evidences, Suspirus and Seathrat. Cicero in the Oration for Rabirius, faith that S. Galba was aman of Consular degree, when Marius was the fixt time Consul. Of M. Seathrat the Consul. Fellows and Tacinus make mention. This is that M. Aurelius Seathrats, who being afterwards in embassing was by the Cimbrians nurdered, as a sppeareth in the threetcore and seventh Epitome.

C. Marins.

CAsisodorus joineth in the consulship this year, L. Cassins and C. Marins. Cussinians and and Marins, Pliny also maketh mention of them in his 10 book and the 3 cilian records, Longinus and and Marins, Pliny also maketh mention of them in his 10 book and 13 chap. Cicero in his oration for Plancius: Plutarch in Marins; and Cicero again in his third book of Duttes, writeth, that C. Marins having taken the repulse twice for the office of Edileship, was creased consul.

Q. Servillus Capio. C. Atilius.

Blequens and Cossidorus match consuls together this year, Q. Servilins Copie and C. Atilins, Servanies. The Sicilian monuments Copie and Servanies. In this year upon the third day of January, M. Tulius Cicero was born, as Gellius in his fifteenth book and eight and twentieth chapt. hath left written. Much mention there is made of these consuls in Cicero and other ancient writers,

P.Ruilius Rufus. C.Manilius de se

Dublius Rutilius Rufus and C.Manilius, are put down by Obsequens and Cassindorns for this years confuls. This P. Rutilius, Cicero in Brutus, calleth the fon of Marcus, About the other conful the Annals do vary and difagree: fome forename him C. others Cneus. Some name him M.Manlius others Mallius or Manie lius. But all this controversy is decided by an old antiquity in stone at Putcoli: the inscription whereof testifieth that P. Rutilius and Cn. Mallins were Confuls; as also the evidence of the Sicilian registers, wherein written it is Rufus and Mallius. Of this Mallius mention there is made in Cicero's Orations for Plancins and Murana: likewise in Valerius, Salust, Tacutus, Florus, Entropius and Orofius. That he was not only a base man and of low hirth but also without all vertue and wir, in the course of his life also vile and contemptible, Cicero writeth in his Oration for Plancins. Whereby it eafily appeareth, that the Mallis were a kinred different from the Manlii. For of Cn. Manlius a Patritian, and that of a most noble house, Cicero would never have spoken in such terms.

650 C.Marine II. C.Flavius Fimbria.

The next Confuls are fet down by Caffioderus, Scharius the fecond time, and C. Flavius Einbriar: by Objequens, C. Marius and C. Flavius.

By the Sicilian registers Marius and Fimbriar: by Padianus upon the Oration for Cornalius, C. Marius the fecond time, and C. Fimbria: Item, G. Marius and Casus Flavius. Befides, Gierro, Velleius, Velleius, Platareh, and others feeds often of the Coff.

651 C.Marius III. L. Aurelius Orestes.

C. Movius reporteth for this years Consuls, C. Movius the third time, and L. Aurelius Orefles. The Sicilian catalogue Mavius and Orefles. Moreover, Mavius even in his ablence was elected Consul the thirdtime, for fear of the Cimbrian war which was defeated, as Villius, Eutropius, the Brevary, and Cicero in his Oration concerning Provinces, do retify,

C. Marins IV. Q. Lutatins.

NExt after them are put down for Confuls by Caffedores and Objequent, C. Marisus the fourth time, and Q. Lutatus. The Sicilian registers exhibit unto us Maris and Catulus, Plutarch and Entropus, Catus Marius the fourth time, and Q. Lutatus Catulus, Of these Confuls, Gicero and Pliny oftentimes make mention.

C.Marim. P. M. Aquilim.

Then succeeded in the Consulhip by the tettimony of Calledoras C. Marsus the firttime, and M. Agustini. Of this C. Marsus the firttime, and M. Agustini. Of this C. Marsus the fire times now Consul, Plusarch and Florus give report. And Geerra in his fection book oil a perfect Orator, nameth M. Agustins for the companion of C. Marsus in his site consulhing. Of whom Plusarch in Marsus speaketh and callet him plane? auditore as also Appian in Mathedatica. Now this Marsin Agustins a Consular man, is the same who afterwards being an Emballador, was by King Mahrid see taken priforer and molt villanously cormented and manifeld.

654 C.Marine VI. L.Valerine Flaccus.

C Affindorus and Obsequens shew unto us for this years confuls, C. M. ris: the fixt time, and Lu. Valerius Flacous. The Sicilian records, Marius and Flacens, This L. Flicens (afterwards Cenfor) was Prefident of the Senat, and matter of the horsemen under Sylla Dictator. Of these consuls George speaketh very often and namely, in his Brutus, in his oration for Rabirisu, against Catiline and Antonie; and also in the defence of Plancine. Pliny likewise in his second book, Filling, and Padianes upon the oration against Pilo, Moreover, Plutarch, and many authors betides. In this year (upon the twelith day of July, then called Quintalias as Macrobius witnefleth) was C. Cafar born, who afterwards was furnamed Distator

M. Antonius. A. Postumius.

Reported it is by taffodorss and Obsequent, that M. Anton:ss and A. Possumes were Consuls this year. The Sicilian registers, thew Albinus and Anonsus. In a fragment also of the capitol marbles, mention there is of An. Possumes. (Misinians book and the Greek records, have Antonius and Albinus.) Of these Consuls. icero speaketh in his oration to the citizens of Rome, after his return out of exile. Likewise, Plus in his 8 book and 7 chap; where he notes this the 655 year. Also Gellius in his 4 book and 6 chapt.

Q. Metellus, T. Didius

Minus Marellus, and T. Didius succeeded confuls next in this year, as Cassidarus and Obs queers do write. And Padianus upon the oration for Curmilus, nameth them: Curio said the pacual and nephew of Macedon.cus. who was Conful with Diduc. Cicero speaketh of the same map in his oration after his return.

Cn. Lentulus P. Crassus.

Not only Cafridarus, but the Sicilian regificis allo. doverlify; that Cn. Lentuls: and P. Craffus were Contuls this year: and Obfequent nameth them; Gn. Cornelius and P. Licinius. Pliny writeth of them in his tenth book and first chapt, also in his 33 book and second chapter.

Cn. Domitius. C. C. Sins.

This year had for Confuls, Cn. Domitius and C. (affins, as Caffindon's and Obfogen at on witness. Cuffunions and the Greek registers, thew Demokrbus and Longins, A fragment of Ver. Fluceus his matbles Demokrbus and C. Caffins fon of I neur. Padiants (peaketh of them upon the oration for Cornelius.)

L. Craffus. Q. Scavola.

Ucius Craffus and Q. Scavola were confuls next following according to Califodorus and Obsequent. In a fragment of the capitol records as touching Confuls, is to be teen Craffus and Musius. In Cenforinus, we find Lu. Licinius fon of Lucius. Cicero in his Brutus writeth, that Craffus the orator bare all dignities of magistracv. together with Scavola the high-prieft, except the Tribunat of commons and the Cenforship: also that whiles they two were Confuls, Q. Hortenfins pleaded the first cause that ever he undertook, at the bar. Padiante, upon the oration of Cicero for Cornelius, maketh mention of L. Licinius Craffusthe Orator, and Q. Matius Seavola the arch-bishop, an orator besides and a protessed lawyer, both Consuls together.

G, Calius. L. Domitius.

Calisadorus and Obsequens declare for this years Contins, Calius and L. Domitus, The Scillian registers. Caldus and As no bear 5. In a capitol fragment, they are Caldus and Lu, Domitus fon of Calus. For V. Uleius maketh mention of one C. Caldus, under Augo fluts. In the manner cross in his book entituled. The thing for a Continhip and in his oration for Mu. an. A Continhip and in his oration for Mu. an. A pain, Cieve in his Symus, nameth them next before Hurennita.

661 C.Valerius Flaccus. M.Herennius.

Here are matched by Cafrodown and Obfequent of Confuls this year C. V. derius Flaces and M. Herennus. The Skillin records, Flaces and Herennus. A broken flone of the capicol, both Flaces and M. Herenvius, Planus in his 29 book and 3 chapt, Cacero also in his Oration for Murana, and in Bruss, speaketh of them, C.Claudius Pulcher. M.Perpenna.

Onfuls this year, were C. Clandius Putcher, and M. Perpennyas wireles Calisatoris and Offigueus. Likewife in a capitol broken non-ment, and in the Si ilian register, it is Pulchy and M. Perpenna. Coero maketh mention of this Clandius as Pretor of vicity in the fourth Oration against Verrez: and as Ædile Curule. in his fecond-book of Offices, So doth Pliny in his 8 book.

663 L. Martins. Sext. Julius.

Afficions and Obsequent name for confuls this year, U. Martin and Sext Julius. The Stillian tends. Philip and Cafer. Emprepue and Orosius Sext Julius Cafer, and L. Martins Philippine. A capitol tragment, Philippine Sext Julius Cafer, and L. Martins Philippine. A capitol fragment, Philippine Sext Julius Cafer, Philippine Sext Julius Cafer, Philippine Sext Date of Caux. Philippine Sext Date of Caix. Philippine Sext Date of C

684 L. Jelius Cafar. P. Rusilius Laupus.

"A Coording to Cassiodarus and O'! sequent the Consultation of the Remit as Lapus. And soit is in Pathonius Vellius, and the 73 Bytome: as also in other asthors who have written of the Marsan war. In a fragment of the capitor, they are seen written, Cass, and P. Rutilis to not Russel, in the Sichitan ecords Cass and Lapus. Cieero in hus book of Divination, speaketh of them both: and in his oration to Plancius the written, that L. Cass missing of an Eddiethip became a Consul.

L. Portius. Cn. Pompeius.

CAssiodorus (etteth down for Consuls this year LiPorti, and Cn. Pomprins, Padianus proot the Oration for Cornelins Suramed Cn. Pompeius Sera's; and L. Porcius; Caso, The Capitol fragment shew no mote but Strabo and Cato, Appius hath made mention of these consuls: so have Oroshus and others that have penied the Marian war. This Cn. Pompeius was father to that Cn. Pompeius the Great: as Appianus witnessient, and Padian upon the Oration against Psso.

L. Sylla. Q. Pompeins.

C Afficdorus sheweth for this years Consuls, L. Sylla and Q. Pompesus: and the same is written in Obsequent, Palletan, Entropius Orofius, Appran P1 tach, and others. The Sichianne-cords have Sylla and Rustlim, Sylla after his victory in the civil war, would need thave binness futuranced Falis. and circefore Palms and the avouchers of the Espirobenoments; in report

ting this confulat, write thus: L. Salla, who afterwards was called Fallan. The fame man in his fecond Confulhip, (which appeared upon record in the capico) is gamed the foot of Lannas, and uphew of Pablins. Moreover, of Q. Pampicas Rofas, Glerry maketh mention in his Brutin,

L, Cornelius Cinna, Cu. Oct avius,

Reported there are by C. flodorers and the Sixilian regitters for Consist this year. In Command Con. Ottawns. Appins Vellams, and the reflewho have recorded the initory of finst time, name them L.Com. lins Comma, and Co., Ottawns. Pluthreb writeth, that L.C. times a being of the adverte fabion to L. Sulla, was by him made, on-ful, upon condition; that he fhould not cross nor fland against the proceeding of the taid Lu, Sull : and to foomas the was entred abort place of government, he began to couble and disquier the prefent flate of the common-weep for the common well and intended an action against Sulla. by the means of Vinginius 1 Tribune of the commons. Howbeit Sulla contemning Vinginians, made an expedition against Mulbardages.

L.Cinna PI. C. Marins PTI. A Frerthis, were Confuls, C. Marias the leaccording to the records of Sicily, C. Madorus, and those that wrote of the civil war. Platarch faith, that Marius was the first man that was feven times conful of Rome. Moreover, as it is to be read in Applan and in the Breviaries. L. Conta and C. Marins without any lawful affembly for Election, declared themselves Confus against this year, and the very fame day that they entred into their magistracy Marins commanded Sext. Licinius'a Senator, to be thrown down from the sock Tarpeia: who after he had committed many hainous crimes and outrages ended his dales upon the Ides of January : in whole room was subordained, L.V.I. Flacous, even he (as men think) who before-time was colleague to C.Marins in his fixt Confulfhip of whom Litere maketh mention in his Oration for his fon

L. Clima III. Cn. Papirius.

Chilledorus' wineffeth that the Confuls fucceding in this year: were I. Cinna the third time, and Cn. Pepirius. The Sicilian records, have Cinna and Cn. Pepirius. The Sicilian records, have Cinna and Cn. Pepirius Carbo, for two years together usurped the Confulate. Also in the book entituled. Of amous persons, we read that Consumade himself Consula second and third time. Of these Confuls fectored and third time. Of these Confuls fectored and third time.

"L.Cimm IV. Cr.Papirius II.

NEXT were Coulds, after Cafeldorns and the Epitomift, Lu. Ciana the fourth time, and Cn. Papirins the second time. Cisero in his Tusculan questions mentioneth Cisero four times Contail: so doth Suscionius in Cafar. And of Cn. Papirins Carbo twice Consul, the captol tables do yeeld testimony. As for the Sicilian records, they put down for contul, (not without sufficiently carbo and Scribonius.

L. Scipio. C. Norbanus.

B Esides the Sicilian tables, Cassiodorm, Obsequents, Appins. Emropins, Florus, and Tacitus in his ninteenth book do witness that Lu, Scipio, and C. Norbansu were Consuls. In the capitol fragments it is written, Lu, Cornelius son of Lucius, nephew of L. Scipio Assaicus.

M. Carins. Cn. Carbo III.

T Find in Cassiodorus, Appianus, Velleius, and others, the next consults to have been, C. Marius and C. C. Carbo the third time. This C. Marius and C. C. Carbo the third time. This C. Marius was the brothers son of C. Marius seven times consult, according to Appian: but Velleius, Placeatus, Placeatus, Eutropuss, and others, say, that he was the son of that C. Marius: and haply indeed he was adopted by C. Marius. Certainly, in the capitol tables, he is called C. Marius, son of C. and nephew of Casus. Ciero speaketh of these Cossi, against Rullus: Pliny also in his 17 book, and they who have set down in writing the civil wars of Syllas

M'.Tulline. Cn. Dolabella.

NExt to those, Cassion we bringeth in for connils, M. Tullina and Cn. Dolabbla. The Sicilian records, have Decula and Dolabbla.
Appina allo foreportest, that Sylla Dictator, to the end that the state and common-weal might feem to retain some shew yet of her ancient dignity, permitted M. Tullina and Cornelius Dolabella to be created consuls, whiles himself after the manner of K. state aloft in a throne above them. Ciorro in his oration against Rullus, and Gellius in his 17 book and 33 chap, maketh mention of M. Tullina and Cn. Cornelius confuls. In a capitol fragment, this M. Tullina, son of M. nephew of A, is surnamed Decula.

L. Sylla II. Q. Metellus.

CAssodress and the Sicilian registers, set down for Consuls, Lu. Systa the second time, and M. Metells. Appire slith moreover, that Systa, Dickator though he was, yet stood content and willing to be declared consul with Q. Metellus Piss., to the end that the commen-weal might. seem to have some likeness yet of a free state. Of these consuls, Citoro maket mention in his Orations against Verres, and cliewhere. Gestinstikewise in his 15 book and 28 chapter, together with Cassodress. This Metellus was suprammed Pius. He it is, who was by lot appraamed Pius. He it is, who was by lot appraamed Pius. He it is, who was by lot appraamed Pius.

pointed to manage the wars in Spain and as gainst Sertorius; and son he was to Namidicus.

P. Servilius. App. Claudius.

He next confuls, were P. Servilius and Ap. The next confuls, were P. Servitius and Ap.

Claudius, as witnesseth Cassodorus. In the Sicilian tables, it appeareth that their furnames were, Vatis and Pulcher: of whom Appiants writeth thus; The people of Rome in oblequious manner to court Syll s the Dictator, requefled of him that he would continue conful fill another year: But Sylla would none of that: and took order, that Ser. If auricus and Claudius Pulcher, should be declared Coss, In a fragment of the capitol he is thus written; Pub, Servilius Vatia, called alterwards flaurious: which furname he took of the liaurians, a nation in Colecia whom he subdued. My authors are, Padianess upon the Orations of Cicero against Verres; Straboin his 14 book; Marcellinus likewife in his 14book, with others.

M. Lepidus. Q. Catulus.

Ar. Lepidnis and Q.Catulus, are by Cafsisadors named Confuls for this year. Plusardor named Confuls for this year. Plusardor reporters, that when L. Sylla had given up his Dictatorship, and reftored again to the people of Rome the free liberty to dispose of consular dignities in their folemn assemblies for elections; M. Lepidus an enemy to Sylla, and an audacious person, was declared Consulaberoe Cassidus, and had the prehemiennee above him, by the earnest endeavour of Cn. Pompeius. Of these Consuls, Pliny maketh mention in his 36 books, wherein he saith, that they governed in the year 676. Likewise, Gieero in his Oration for Cornelius: Florus out of Livy: Valerima 2 book 3 chap, and Europoims,

M. Emylius. D. Brusus.

This year had for Confuls by the testimony of Castindows and Obsequent, M. Emyling and D. Brutat. Macer, a Tribune of the commons, speaketh of them in Salus, complaining that the commons were by the nobles oppressed. In like fort, Cierre in Brutus, and in his second book of Duties, as also Valerius in the 7 book and 7 chap. This M. Emyline was surnamed Lepidus and Livianus: for our of the family of Livius he was adopted by M. Lepidus, and therefore right well he is called, son of Manuscott.

Gn. Octavins. C. Curio

V Errim Flacens fetteth down for Confuls, C. C. Can Otherius fon of M. nephew of C. and C. Scribbnins. Curio, The fame doth Cicero reports in Brunss. So do Saluff, Obfoguens Lettantus in his first book, and Pliny in his fecond book and 35 chapter. Cio. in his Brutus, and Pliny in his 7 book and 41 chapt, make report of three Cath Curions, all Orators to wit, the father, the fon, and the fons fon or nephew.

C Assiodorus putteth down for consule this year, L. Octavius and C. Cotta. Obsequents, C. Associus and L. Octavius. Pliny in his second book and 35 chapt. Ciero likewise in his third and fifth Orations against Verres, maketh mention of L. Octavius, and C. Auselius consuls. Upon the broken marbles of the capitol, they stand to be seen. L. Octavius son of Cn. nephew of Cn. and C. Auselius. This year the Sicilian registers over-skip. Pedianus writeth, that there were at this time three Cotta's brethren, and all of consular degree, namely, Caius, Marcus and Lucius.

680 L.Licinias Lucullus, M.Cotta.

For this years confuls, Cafiodorus registreth L. Lucull's, and M. Cotra. The Sicilian records, Lucullus and Cotta, Eutropius, Appanus in Mibridatica, and Planarch in Lucullus, nameth them, L. Licinius Lucullus, and M. Aurelius Cotta, Mention there is made of them by Cicero against Verrer; and by Floras in the 93 and 94 Epitomes. This L. Lucullus had for his grand-father that Lucullus, who was consul with A. Albinus, as Cicero and Plutarch do teffify.

M. Lucullus. C. Cassius.

THis year (by the testimony of Cafsiodorus,) had for contuls, M. Lucullus, and C. Caffins: but the Sicilian records, nominate Marcellus and Callius: whom Cicere in an oration against Verres, nameth M. Terentius and C. Cassius: faying that the laws Terentia and Cassia, were by them promulged. For, so far forth as we may conjecture by the capitol fragments M. Licinius Lucullus, was adopted by M. Terentius Varro, and therefore called M. Terentins Varro Lucullus, Cicero in Lucullus, and Plutareh, call L. Lucullus and M. Lucullus brethren, whom Eutropius nameth cofin germans by two fifters. That the furname of Caffins was Varus, appeareth both by a conduit pipe or waterspout of lead found in Rome, and also for that Appian in his fourth book, writeth that C. Caffins Varns, a man who had been Conful, was condemned and outlawed by the Triumvirs.

L. Gellus. Cn. Lentulus.

The confuls next following, by the report of C. Ilbodorus, were L. Gellius and Cu. Lennulus. In like fort Cioceo maketh mention of them in his oration for Bulbus, and ellewhere. Plusarchalfo in Craffus, with Eutropius and Orofius. Culpinians book the weth Poplicola and Lennulus. Now the furname of L. Gellius was Poplicola, as witneffeth Osuphrius.

Cn. Aufidins. P. Lentulus.

Afflodorus fetteth down for confuls this year, Cn. Aufdius, and P. Lennulus. The Sicilian regillers have Lennulus and Orefter. Entropius, C. Lennulus and Cn. Aufdius Orefter. This Cn. Aufdius Orefters, when he went beide a Tribunship of the commons, was chosen conful, as Cleero writteth in his oration for Planeius, This is that P. Lennulus furnamed Sura, who afterwards, being a man of confular calling, and who had been twice Pretor, was hanged and strangled to death when Cieero was conful, for that he had conspired with Carilin: whose grand-father was P. Lennulus Fusdent of the Senat, as Cieero faith, pleading for his houle, and inveighing against Carilin: as also Padiamus.

M. Crassus. Cn. Pompeius.

NExt to them were Cost, M.Crassius and Cr., Pompeius, according to Cassiodre, Plus arch, Appian, and the Sicilian records. Their timenanes for certain, were Divers and Magyns, Alleheold writers speak much of this their first Consulation. Plus arch reporteth that L.Crassius attained to the Consular dignity, by the means of Pompeius the consula dignity, by the means of Pompeius the consular dignity, but the writing upon the oration for Cornelius, and all other authors speak of these consular.

Q.Metellus. Q. Hortensius.

Then followed confuls, Q. Matellus and Q. Hortenfus, as Caffiodore and the Sicilian catalogued to teftity, Padiamis matcheth Q. Metelus Creticus with Q. Hortenfus that great Orator! Likewife, Jelephus in his fourteenth book of Jewish antiquities. Cicero in Brutus calleth this Q. Hortenfus, the fon of Lucius, Q. Metelus afterwards upon the conquest made of Crete furnamed Creticus, was the fon of L. Dalmaticus, as may be gathered out of Padiamus upon the Oration of Tully [called Drainatso] against Verres.

686 [L.Metellus. Q.Marcius.

PÆdianus writing upon Tulle's Oration against Pife; Dio likewise and Cassidonary, colon and

C. Pifo. M'.Glabrio.

There succeeded Consuls, C. Pife and M. Glabrie, witness Cassioner and the Sicilian records. And in Die they follow immediately by the name of Manium Acilius and C.Pife. Cieero in his twelfth book of Epistles to Attiems speaketh of C. Pife and M. Acilius Glabrie, men of Consular place and calling. Padian in his comentaties upon the oration for Cornelius maketh mention of C.Pife and the law Cassions whim made, as ton thing inordinate and indirect nite after dignities of state. Moreover, of them Valerius in his fourth book writeth.

M'. Lepidus. L. Volcatius.

Cassadare putteth down for Consuls. Manius Libidus, and with him L. Torquams, but untruly. The Greek records have Volcanius Tullus, Dio Lu. Tullus, and Anylius Lepidus. Salifin Casiline, L., Tullus and M. Lepidus. Padian upon the oration for Cornelius, M. Lepidus and L. Volcanius. Cicero in his oration for Salla hath L. Volcanius Tullus: so as it appeareth it should be, M. Emylius Lepidus, and L. Volcanius Tullus.

L. Cotta. L. Torquatus.

The Confuls elect, were L. Autronius Patus (as it appeareth upon amonument of a triupph in the capitol, and not Antronius, as commonly it is read) and P. Cornelius Sullat who being condemned for ambitious feeking after that office, and having therefore suffered condign punishment, their accusers stept into their place of government, namely, L. Aurelius (on of Marcus, surnamed Cotta; and L. Manlus son of Lucius surnamed also Torguans: as testify Salus, Dio, Pedian upon the oration for Cornelius, and that which he made in his white tobe: and lastly, Tranguillus in Celar.

L. Cafar. C.Figulus.

The year next ensuing had for Consuls, by the retimony of Cassinders, Padianus, and the Sicilian records, L. Cassa and C. Figulus, whom Dio calleth Lucius Casar, and Lucius Marius son of Cassinders, lurnamed Figulus. Cleero in his oration for Sulla, nameth them L. Julius and C. Figulus: so doth Salust in Gaitlina, This L. Julius Casar is his son who was Consul in the Marsan wat.

M. Cicero. C. Antonius.

He Confuls this year, were M. Tullius fon of M. furnamed Cicero, and C. Antonius fon of M. as testify Dio in his seven and thirtieth book, Cassidadore, Salassi in his Catilinary oration, Velleius in his second book, Joseph in his Jewish antiquities 14 book 8 chapter, Plany in his eight book and three and fistieth chapter, Tranquillus in the life of A gussus, Appian, Entropius, Padian, and others.

D. Silanus. L. Murana.

THere followed confols next, D. Silanus, and L. Murana, as Caffiodorus, Saluft, and the Sicilian records do witness. Dio calleth them D. Junius fon of M. furnamed Silanus and L. Licinius fon of L. furnamed Murana. Eutropius nameth them D. Junius Silanus, and L. Licinias, fon of that L. Murana who in quality of Pro-pretor triumphed over Mithridates (as Cicero faith) pleading for Murana himself, being accused and in trouble for unlawful seeking to be Cos. In this affembly for election of Cos. L. Sergius Catilina suffered the second repulse: for anger whereof, in a melancholy he brake our into a conspiracy, and practised against the state: and likewise Servins Sulpitins Rufus the lawyer, who afterwards accused Murana for the crime aforefaid.

M. Pupius. M. Valerius.

Caffiodorus letteth down for Consuls this year, M. Pupius and M. Palerius. The Sicilian registers, Pio and M. Pala. Dio, M. Pupius, son oi M. furnamed Pio: and M. Palerius son of M. furnamed Meffala Niger. Of this Meffala Niger, there is also mention made by Pedian upon the oration for Seawas. Also of M. Meffala and M. Piso: in Plinies seventh book, and fix and twentieth chapter, seven and thirtieth book, tap. second, and the eight book, thap, six and twenty. And in Cafars first book of the Gauls war. Of M. Piso Padian likewise speakers writing upon the oration against Pio.

Q. Metellus. Q. Afranius.

CAffodorus and the Sicilian registers nominate for this years Consuls, Q. Metellus and L. Africanus. The like doth Obsequent and Gicero in his first book of Epitles to Asticus, Dio nameth them L. Afranius son of L. and Q. Cacilius, Son of Q. surnamed Metellus Celer, Both of them were advanced to the Consulate (as. Dio winesseth) by the means of Pompeius, for they had been both twain his Lieucenants serving under him in Afra.

C.Cafar. M.Bibulus.

CAssociates, Sustantius, together with the Sicilian tables and the Breviaties, do match together for consults this year, C. Casar and M. Bibulus. Die, C. Julius son of C. Casar, and M. Galpurnius. Plusarch and Appun, C. Julius Casar, and C. Bibulus. Albeit Appun as also Entropius and Orosus give Bibulus the forename of Lucius, of Casar and Bibulus, Ciccrospeaketh in his first book of Episles, writing to Lensulus.

" A yuffian. * Tertiarum.

CAssindorus and the Sicilian records shew for Confuls this year, L. Pilo and A. Gabinius. Dio, L. Calparnius fon of L. Pifo: and A. Gabinius fon of Aulus, Cafar, Cicero, Plutarch, and Caffiodorus, L. Pifo, and A. Gabinins. Cafar Writeth of them in his first book of the Gauls war, and Plutarch in the life of Caso the yonger. Cicere also in his oration against Pife and for Sexring. This Pife the Conful Cicero and Pedian furnamed Caloning, for fo his grand-father before him was called as appeareth in the capitol secords for the year 606.

> P. Lenenlus. Q. Metellus.

He Confuls following for this year, were by Caffodorse and the Sicilian records, P. Lentulus and Q. Metellus, By Dio, Pub. Cornelims fon of Publins, Lemalus Spinther : and Q.Cacilius ion of Qu. Metellus Nepos. Ofthem ipeaketh Valerins in his ninth book. Lentulus (qd. he) and Marellus companions in the confulthip were beheld and feen both upon the stage like plaiers: but the one of them took the jurname * Secundarum. of Spinther * one of the second fort of actors: the other, but that he had gotten the name of * Neparalready for his lewd behaviour, should have been called Pamphilus, after the name of * one of a third fort, whom for all the world he refembled. Of the same men, Cicero in his first book of Epittles, and in very many of his orations. Plant alfo in his feventh book and fecond chapter, Plucarch in the life of Cicero, and all other writers make much mention.

Cn. Lentulus, L. Philippus, CAssiderus putreth down for Confuls, Cn. Lentulus and L. Philippus. The Sicilian records, Marcellus and Philippus, Dio, Cn. Cormelius fon of Publius, Lentulus Marcellus: and L. Martins fon of Lucius Philippus, Of Lentulus and M. Marcellus Confuls, Cicero speaketh in his Epifiles to Lemulus, Plusarch alfo in the life of Cate, maketh mention of Martins Philippus now Conful. This Cn. Lemulas was the fon of that P. Lentulus, as Cicero faith in his Brutus, And furnamed he was Marcellus, and not Classdiss, that it might be known of what family of the Claudii he was descended.

> 696 Cn. Pampains. M. Craffus.

THEN as by the obstinate persistance of C. Cate Tribun of the commons, (who ever interposed his negative) there could be no ordinary affembly holden for the creation of magiffrats, the whole degree of the Senators changed their weed in token of grief: so as upon an Interregency between, Cn. Pompeius was choien Contul, and with him M. Craffus the second time, as Plutarch, Dio, and Appian do witnels. Lucius Domittus Emobarbus, whom Cato and all good men accompanied and prefented, was in the common place by violence throughly beaten, and Cato himfelf wounded. These Coff. Dio calleth Cn. Pompeius, fonof Cn. Magnus the fecond time : and M. Liginius fon of Publins Craffus, the second time. Of them Padiants. Eutropius, the Sicilian registers and others make mention.

L. Domitius.

D'o in his nine and thirtieth book, for the year after the cities foundation 700. following the computation of Varros avoucheth Confuls, Appius Claudius, fon of Appius Pulcher: and L. Domitius fon of Cneus, Enobarbus, Caffiodore and Obsequens, name them. An Claudius and L. Domitius, whom the Siciliantecords call Pulcher and Enobarbus: and Adian upon the Oration for Scaurus, L. Domitius Enobarbus, and Appins Claudius Pulcher, Of this L. Domitius, ion of Cneus Enabarbus, Calins speaketh in the eight book of Giceros Epistles.

Cn. Domitius. M. Melfala

A Gainst this year there sood in election and laboured with much earnestnes and ambitious defire to be Confuls, Cains Memmius, Cn. Domisius. M. Meffala and M. Scaurus, as Cicero writeth to his brother Quintus. But arthe last, even in the seventh month of this year there were created by means of an Interregency, M. Meffata and Cn. Domitius. Neither had they been choien then; but that Q Pompeins Rufus a Tribun of the commons, who still opposed himself to hinder and debar all elections was by order from the Senate committed: and the Senate made countenance to do the like by the reft, as many as went about to crofs the faid election, Thus much Dio, But Appian faith that the common-weal continued for eight months space in Anarchy without any soveraign magifirsts of thate. Plutareh writeth, that in this fo great extremity of danger, Lucilius a Tribun of the commons, preferred a bill for the creating of Cneus Pemperus Dictacos, who should redress all enormities and fet upright the state again: but Caro gainfaid it, and fo nothing was effected. Die faith moreover that the Tribuns of the commons moved for the chufing not of a Dictator only, but also of military Tribuns in confuls authority: but through the earnest labour of Pompeins, Confuls were created, Meffala and Calvinus, which furnames fland to be feen upon the Sicilian records. Also in the capitolmonuments, written it is thus. Cn. Domimitius Calvinus fon of M. nephew of Marcus, anno 708 and 717.

7020 Cn. Pompeius, Q. Metellus,

Vien by reason of the contentions afuls could not be created by the Calends of Farmary: there passed an Act of the Senat, according to the mind and advice of Bibulus, by yertue whereof Cn. Pompeius was by the Interregent Serv. Sulpitius created Conful the third time, upon the five and twentieth of February, without a Collegue first, and presently entred upon the government. But afterwards to avoid the envy that might arise thereupon, he took unto him as companion in the Confulfhip for the five last months of the year behind, Q. Ca. cilius Pius Metellus Scipio, his wives fatheri Thus writeth Padian upon the Oration of Cicero in defence of Milo: Plutarch likewife, Ap. also called P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica fon of Nafica Scipio, who being adopted by Q. Metellus Pins, is called by Calins in the familiar Epiftles of Cicero, Q. Caciline for of Q. nephew of Q. Metellus Pius Scipio.

M. Marcellus. Ser Sulpitius.

Gainst this year were Consuls created, M. AMarcellus, and Serv. Sulpitius, as Caffiodo-) rus, Plutarch, and Appian witness. The Sicilians records call them Rufus and Marcellus, Dionameth them Servius Sulpitius fon of Q. furnamed Rufus, and M. Claudius fon of M. furnamed alio Marcellus. Of these Consuls Suetonius alio maketh mention in Cafar: likewite Cicero in his Epifles, and the Epitome 1 18. This Margeb lus was the cofin german of that Marcellus who the year next following was Conful: and brother german to him who two years after bare the Confulthip, as may be collected out of Verrius Flaceus Die and Suctonius. sadblingt,

L. Paulus. C. Marcellus.

Here succeeded Confuls, L. Paulus and C. Marcellus : witnels Cuffindore, Dio Suctonis us, Hirrius in his 8 book, together with the Sicilian records. The one of thefe is by Do named. L. Emplins, for of Marcus, furnamed Paulus; the other by Gicero in his Epilles, C. Claudius fon of Cates, Marcellus, Die writerh, that this man by fome was reported torbe de 10. i.e. the brothers fon others a fexede i.e. the brother of Mar. Marcellus, but Sucionius faith plainly, he was the brothers fon.

L. Lentulus, C.Marcellus,

Affiodorus setteth down for Consuls this year L. Lemulus & C.Marcellus, as alie Appian, Platarch, Hirtius, Florus, and Cicero in his

Lu. Cornelius, fon of Publius Lentulus : and P. Claudius fon of Marcus Marcellus. In the broken marbles of the Capitoll it is to be feen thus C. Claudius son of Marcus, nephew of Marcus Metellus. This is that Lucius Lentulus Crus, who as Calius testifieth in the former election took a repulse, and by Cicero is called in the Oration avainst Vatinius, Flamen Martialis.

C.Cafar. P.Servilius.

WHen Caius Cafar the Dictator held the folemn affembly for the election in the latter end of the former year, Confuls there were created Cains Julius, fon of Cains Cafar. and Pub Servilius, fon of Publius Ifaurious, For now was the year come, when as Cafer by the laws might be chosen Conful! for so in the third book of his own Commentaries he faith pianus and Dio. This Metellus Pius Serpio was; himself, and to Dio in his one and fortieth book, Plut arch, Tranquillus, Appianus, and Cafe fiodorus do tellifie of him. But he meaneth that law which expresly forbad and debarred, that no man might be within ten years ipace chofen Col. twice. As for Publius Servilius he was the fon of that Publius Servilius that first took the furname Ifauricus, who this year bare his Consulfhip at Rome, while Cafar warred in Ma-

Distalligence that Pompeius was musdered, To faith, That the people of Rome having endeavoured earnestly, that there might pals as honourable decrees for Cafar the Conqueror as possible might be. And therefore they ordained, that he might be Confu five years together, and Dictator not for fix months as beforetime, but a whole year; and endued with the Tribunes authority for ever. Now Cafar, albeit he was without Italy, immediatly entred upon his Dictatorship, having sub-ordained under him for his Generall of the horse, Mar. Antonius a man who yet had not been Prator. This appeareth by the Capitoll records, Dio. Plutarch, and Cicero in his fecond Philippica. But under what pretence and colour Cafar took upon him this Dictatorship and the rest following, Marcus Antonius sheweth in his Oration of Cafars praise in Dio: wherein he faith, that Cafar was created Dictator to make head against the enemies, and therefore the troubles and diffentions of war was the caufe of this creation. But certain it is that Cafar became Dictator for another cause, namely, that by the means of that foveraign power, he might draw unto himfelf alone the whole managing and government of the State. which beforetime had been administred by many perfors. But Dio addern moreover and faith, that in the beginning of this year there were neither Prators nor Confuls e'ected. For Marcus An onius Generall of the horse, arraied in his purple robes, with 6x Li-Epigles do testifie. Die calleth these Consuls ctors; making way before him, tesembled a certain ih ew of the ancient liberty. But within a while after he departed forth of the City, and that which never was before done by any Malter of the horie, he left Lu. Cafar an aged man, Provost and governor of Rome. Howbeit, in the end of the year, after the recovery and conquest of Levet, when King Prolomen was: flain, and Pharmaces K. of Pont w vanquished; Consuls were created, Q. Fusius, son of Quintus, Calenus; and Pub. Vatinius, fon of Publius. And there the Capitoll tables do shew, and Caffiedorus alfo. Ot Publica Vatinius Conful, Macrobius in his second book maketh men-

C.Cafar. M. Lepidus.

TErrius in his capitoll tables letteth forth Dictator, The stone record of Colatia, whereof Onuphrius speaketh here, nameth C. Julius Cafar the third time, and M. Emyline Lepidus. But Die in his three and fortieth book. The next year following (quoth he) he bare the Dictatorship and the Consulat both, the third time, and took unto him for his Collegue in both-Magistracies, M. Emylius Lepidus. Of the same. mind feemeth Tranquille to be in Cafar, chap. feventy fix. Likewife Hirtius in the fift book. But Onuphrise supposeth that both Tranguillus and Dio yea, and Hirtins also was in an errour. For with the capitoll records, Plut arch and Eutropius agree; who write that Cafar this year was Conful the third time with M. Lepidus and Dictator the second time.

THey who cut the capitol merbles, do shew unto us that Cafar this year was third time Dictator with M. Lepidus General of the horse. From whom Dio differeth; who doth report that this year Cafar was Dictator the 4 time, and Lepidus fecond time Mafter of the horsemen: allo that Lepidus fellow-Conful with Cafar, declareth himselfagainst all law, Generall of the horse. Thus much of the Dictator. But as touching the Confuls this year, there is to beseen written in the Index or table of Dio, that the same year Cafer bare his fourth Dictatorship, and likewite his fourth Consulat without Collegue. In that history also it appeareth, that Cafar prefently entred upon his fourth Consulat, but bare it not throughout the whole year: and that so soon as he was returned to Rome out of Spain, he refigned and substituted in his place for the rest of the year, Q. Fabius Maximus, and Cn. Trebonius. With Dio, the evidences agree that are written in the capitoll fragments: wherein it appeareth that Cafar was the fourth time Conful and that without a Collegue; as Sigonius maketh interpretation, For Cufpinians Kalender, together with the Sicilian registers, do shew that Cafar was Conful now alone the fourth time. In like manner, Appian and Plutarch make mention of Cafar, who being Comul elect from the fourth time led an army into Spain. Astor Q. Fabius. Suetonius calleth him a three months Conful. Die faith moteover, that Cafar upon the death of Q. Fabins the Conful, declared the very last day of the year, C. Canning to be the Conful for those few hours that were behind Whereof Cicero in his leventh book of Epifiles. Writing to Curius, Macrobius in his fecond book of Saturnalia, Tacitus in his eighteenth. book, Pliny in his feventh, and Smioning in Cafar do make report.

A. S. G. 710 12 - 11 - 11 C.Cafar, M. Antonins.

Die setteth down for this year Cafar Dicta-torthe fift time, together with M. Emy-Consuls of this year, only without ever a . Ling Lepidus Master of the horsemen, But the capitoll tables avouch him Dictaror now the fourth time. Dio and Appian write that he created himself Consul together with M. Antonius. Likewise Cassiodorus and the Sicilian regifters give recordy that Cafar was this year Consulthe fift time, together with M. Antomus. And Macrobius in his first book speaketh of them, Moreover, written it is in the capitoll and Colotian tables, that C. Cafar was Cof. the fift time, with M. Antonius fon of M. and that in the room of Cafar there was chosen P Cornelius fon of Publius, And this was P. Cornelius Dolabella, whom Cafar himfelf (if he had lived) meant to have substituted in his own room: Platarch writeth, that Cafar Conful now the fift time took unto him for his companion in government Mittelnius. And when as he would have subordained Dolabella in his own flead. Antony gainfaid it in an oration : and afterwards, when Cafar a fecond time would have had Dolabella to be declared Conful, and fill Antony croffed and withflood it, Cafar gave over his enterprise. But after Cafar was murdered, Antony (as Dio writeth) fearing some infurrection and commotion if he should have rejected Delabella, took him into the fellowship of government. Appian laith, that immediatly after Cafar was killed, Dolabella entred into the Magistracy, So faith Velleins alfo. And this verily was the year, in which the compiracy was contrived against Cafar, whereof the captains were M and Decimus both Bruti, C. Trebonius & C. Caffins: and upon the fifteenth day of March, when he fat in Councill together with the Senat in the court of Pompey, he was was stabbed, and received in his body three and twenty wounds: which done the murderers who had wrought the feat feized the capitoll. And c. Octavins his nephew or fifters fon, whom cafar had made in his will his half-heir, and adopted to bear his own name, came out of Epirus, whither cafar had fent him before, minding to make war upon the Parthians, and after all lucky and happy proceedings, took upon him the name of cafar, according to his last will and testament.

C.Pansa. A.Hirtim.

Io, Caffiodorus, and the reft, nominate Con-Jio, Caprouoi as, and con Pansa Capronianus, and A. Hirtius, fon of Aulus. Cuspinians book sheweth Cretonianus and Hirtius, Whereby it may be understood, that Cretonianus was the furname of Panfi, but peradventure written for Capronianus. In the Colorian table they tas. are named C. Vibius, son of Cains, and An. Hirtitius fon of Hirtius. This Hirtius was one of their fons who were out-lawed by Sulla, and whom Cafir (as Die reporteth) advanced to honourable dignities. Both these, and the Consuls of the year following, were by Cafar elected and dethined thereto, before he was flain, Dio, Appians and others report, that of these two Confuls, Hirtius in the time of the civill war, in a battell before Modena against Antonius was flain; and Pansasome daies after, upon a hurt received in the same fight, died at Bononia. In the room of Panfa, C. Octavius was sub-elected Conful, the nineteenth of August in the same year, and he instead of Hirtius, took unto him for his Collegue Q. Padius.

M. Lepidus, L. Plancus.

Affinderus and the Sicilian records put down for Conjuls, M. Lepidus and L. Plancas. Dio, M. Emylius Lepidus the second time, and Lu. Munatius, son of Lucius, surnamed Plancus. Of these Confuls Suetonius speaketh in Tiberius, faying, That Tiberius was bornafter the battell of Philippi, when Mar. Emylius Lepidus was the fecond time Conful with Munatius Planens. Now had there been before appointed Confuls against this pr by Cafar, D. Brutus and Lu. Planens. But by reason that Brutus the year before was by the law Pedia condemned and after killed, and so the three Triumvirs usurped the rule of the common-weal; agreed it was, that M. Lepidus one of the Triumvirs who beforetime also had been Consul with Casar in his third Cousulship, should together with Planeus, (who also taking part and fiding with Antony, had revolted from the Common-weal) administer the Consular. Moreover, this Brutus was by Plutarch, Appian, Dio, and Zonaras, called also Albinus; I suppose, for that out of the race of the Bruti he was adopted and incorporat into the house of the Albini. In this year, during the civill war, Brutus and Cassius were slain in battell before Philippi, as Dio, Plutareh, Appian, and others write.

P. Servilius II. L. Antonius.

He Colotian tables, Dio, and Caffiodorus match Confuls together for this year, Lu. Antonius fon of Marens, furnamed Pietas, and P. Servilius, Son of Publius, I Jauricus, the second

Tiberius. This P. Scrvilius was first Conful with Cefar in his fecond Consulat; whose tather Ifauriens died a little before, as Dio and Eusebius report. As for L. Antonius, named he is by Dio Pieras, for that being Conful, he together with Fulvia the wife of his brother Marcus managed the affairs of fate with that mind, as if his whole care had been for his brother the Triumvir, in regard of which brotherly and affectionat kindness, he challenged the furname of Pie-

Afinius, fon of Cneus, Pollio. O. theie Jofephus speaketh in his fourteenth book of the lews antiquities and three and twenty chapter. Toward the end of this year, Dio writeth, that these Consuls gave up their place, and that other Confuls were substitute for those few daies that were to come; and one of them was L. Cornelius Balbus Gaditanus. And therefore in the Colotian table these subordained Consuls stand under these names, L. Cornelius, ion of Lucius, and P. Canidius, son of Lucius. Of Pub. Cor-nel. Balbus Consul, Pliny writeth, his seventh book and three and fortieth chapter, and Velleius in his fecond book.

L. Cenforinus, L. C. alvisius, Assiodorus inferred for the next Consuls, Lucius Cenforinus and Caius Calvissus. The Sicilian records have Cenforinus and Sabinus.
Dio, L. Martius and C. Sabinus, C. Calvifius ion of Cains, is named by Dio in the catalogue or table, Sabinus, although it be read there commonly but amils, Afinius, 786 Ap.Claudius. C.Norbanus.

Onfuls that follow, were App. Claudius and C. Norbanus, as Caffiodorus faith. But as the Sicilian registers, purport, Cenforinus and Sabinus: as Dio writeth, App. Claudius fon of Cai-us, Pulcher'; and C. Norbanus, fon of Caius, Flaccus. Astquehing Tadius Afer the Conful elect, and substitute in the room of another, who before heentred into government being terrified with the minatory threats of C. Cafir, threw himself down headlong, and so brake his neck, fee Tranquillus in Augustus.

M.Agrippa, L.Caninius,

Affiodorus putteth down for Confuls, M.
Agrippa and Lu. Caninius. The Sicilian regiflers Agrippa and Gallus, Dio, M. V. pfanius, fon of Lucius, Agrippa; and L. Caninius fon of Lucius, Gallus. Josephus in his fifteenth book of Antiquities, avoucheth Confuls, Mar, Agrippa and C. Canidius Gallus. Neperalfo in the life of time. Of these Consuls, Suetonius writteth in Actions, calleth Vipsanius, Agrippa, In the capitol.

marbles and in other old monuments of Rome his gentile name is passed over, and namely, in the torestont of the Temple, called Pamboon, wherein is engraven M. Agrippa son of Lucina, Consul the third time, Tacina also in his first book mentioneth this Agrippa.

718 L.Gellius. M.Cocceius.

Affiodorus nameth for Consuls this year, L.Gellius and M.Cocceius. The Sicilian records flew Publicula and Nerva: Dio hath Lu. Gellius fon of Lucius Poplicola, and M. Cocceius Nerva. Out of the capitoll fragments it appeareth, that L. Gellins was the fon of Lucius, and nephew of Lucius. By the report of Dio, this Lu. Gellius was brother to M. Valerius Mellila, For it is the time man who was pardoned before by M. Brutus: whereby it may be understood, that Potlicola was his furname by way of adoption : for they were not the Gellii but the Valerii, that carried the jurname of Publicola. The fame fragments do shew, that the faid Gellius lest his place, and that another was put in his room. And haply it was L. Munating fon of Lucius, nephew of Lucius Plancus: whom Pliny in his thirteenth book and third chapter, faith to have been twice Conful: but in what year he was the second time, a man cannot find unless it were in this.

719 Sext Pompeius, L.Cornificius.

Affiodrus and the Sicilian records teffifie, that this years Consuls were Sex. Pompeisus and L. Cornifi ius, Dio, L. Cornificius son of Lucius; and Sextus Pompeius son of Sextus. This year Sex. Pompeius, on of Cneus was flain.

M. Antonius. L. Scribonius Libo.

Assiodorus putteth down for Confuls, Lu. Scribonius and Lu. Acratinus. The Sicilian eatalogue Antonius and Libo. Dio, M. Antonius ion of Marcus the second time and L. Scriboni. us . fon of Lucius Libo. The fame Die fairh moreover, that M. Antonius the Triumvir, presently upon the very Calends of gannary gave over the Magistracy, and substituted in his own sead Lu. Sempronius Atratiuus : and therefore many there be that affirm how it was not Antonius but Airminus that was Conful this year with Libo. That Confuls also were sub-elected to bear out one part of the year, it is to be found in some authors that have set forth the Municipal Annals, And verily Dio maketh mention of Paulus Emylius Conful, for one part of the year, and that he built a flately porch or gallery at his own charges, and dedicated it in his Confulfhip,

C.Cafar. L.Volcatius.

C. Cafar and L. Volcatius. Dio, Cafar the fecond time, and L. Volcains fon of Lucius Tollins. They who composed and digested the Scilian registers, very unfitly fet down Cefar and Cicro for this years Consuls, Of this Consulhing of Cefar, Suctonius and Dio speak, saying, that he held it very few hours, as Antonius also beforetime. Instead of Cefar was Lu. Antonius subrogated, and many other for one part or other of the year, who in the book entituled, Old inscriptions, are reckoned in this manner:

Emperor Cafar II. L.Volcatius.
Kal.Januarii. L.Amonius.
Kal.Maii. L.Flavius.
Kal.Maii. L.Flavius.
Kal.Julii. M. Arilius.
C. Fonteius.
Kal.Sept. L.Vinnius.
Kal.Cetob. L.Lanonius.
Of L. Flavius made Confulby M. Antonius.
and depoted Dool likewife maketh mention.

Cn. Domitius. C. Sofius.

Asiadorus nominateth for Confuls this year. C.n. Domitus and C. Sofus, The Sicilian records, Exobarbus and Sofus, Dio Cneus Domitus son of Cneus, nephew of Cneus. To bus; and C. Sofus fon of C. nephew of Caius, Nepas writeth, that Asticis died, when (n. Domistias and C. Sofus were Confuls, Affiedorus avoucheth Consuls this year, C. (afar the second time, and M. Messala. The Si. ilian registers, Octavius and Corvinus. Dio Cafar the third time, and M. Valerius, fon of Marcus, furnamed Me fala Corvinus, and that right ruly. For Caffiodorus maketh no reckoning of that Confullhip Cafar which he bare with Padius, because he was subordained in the place with another. But Dio and Appins do witnels, that Cafar and Amony were marched together this year, both of them in their second Consulfhip, at what time as upon peace made, with Sextus Pompeius, they were appointed Consuls beforehand for eight years next ensuing: howbeit, in the first year the people turned Antony out of his Confulthip, and proclaimed war against him and Cleopatra, and so in his place was Mar. Meffala declared Conful. As touching the Confuls this year subordained, thus we find written in the ancient inscriptions, Emperour Cafar IIII. M. Valerius. Kal. Maii. M. Titius. Kal. Octobris. Cn. Pompeius.

C.Casar II. M.Messala,

C.Cafar III. M.Craffus.

CAffiodorus nameth for this years Confuls, C., Cafar the third time, and M. Crafus, The Sicilian records Oft norms and Crafus, The fourth time, and M. Licinius, ion of Macus Crafus, He added moreover, and faith, Cafar in the midflof that water croffed the feas out of Macedomy into Italy, wherein he was the fourth time Conful with M. Craffu. Orofius likewife noteth, that Cafar called Emperor, was Conful the fourth time with M. Livius Craffus. Of other Confuls subflictured after M. Livius, this we find in the old inscriptions, Emperor Cafar IV. M. Licinims.

Kal. Jul. C. Antiftius.
Ibid, Septembr. M. Tullius.
Kal. Novembr. L. Sanius.

Of M. Tullius Conful with Angustus, Die maketh mentionin his story of this years acts, Pliny also in his 22 book and 6 they and Plusarch in Cicero. By Vellaius and Tacitus it appeareth that Antistius had for addition the surrance of Vetura and Samings of Sevinas.

C.Cafar IIII. Sex. Aprileius.

IN Coffiodorus the Confuls be C. Cefar the fourth time, and Sext. Apuleius, In Di. Cefar the fift time, and Sext. Apuleius ion of Sext. In the Sicilian records, Octavianus and Apuleius: in the Antique inferiptions, Emperour Cefar the fift time, and Sext. Apuleius, Dia faith, this was the year 725 from the foundation of the City. Of Cefar five times Confuls, there is to be feen an old Epigram or infeription in this manager.

Senatus Populufá, Romanus, Imp.Caf.Divi Julii Fil.Cof.Quinc. Caf.Defie, Sext. Imp.Sept. Refp.confervata. That is.

The Senat and people of Rome. By Emperour Cefan, fon of Julius of famous memory, Conful five times, elect Conful the fixt time, and Emperor the feventh, the Commonwealth faved,

C. Gefar V. M. Agrippa II.

Afficiency declareth for Confuls this year, Cafar the fit time, and M. Agripps the fectored time. Orefins and the Sicilian records. Cafar the fixt time, and Agripps the fectored time.
Dies. Cafar the fixt time, and Agripps the fectored time, and the fixt time and Agripps the third time to the trias to be read the fectored time, as Sigonius advertifeth, so as the next year it should be written the third time. And this plainly appeareth by the superficiption of that Temple (which he erected and mamed Pantheon) in this form, [M. Agripps fon of L. shird-time Conful built is.] For Die faith, that this Temple was finished two years after that he was Conful with Cafar the seventh time Consulthip, and not the fourth. For otherwise in the front of the said Temple, he would have written, [Conful the fourth time.]

E.Cafan VI. M. Agrippa III.

Affideraciaith, that the next Confuls were cafar the fixt time, and Mar. Agrippathe third time, But Dio, cafer the seventh time, and Ageippe the fourth time. But what is to be thought of them both, is evident by that which hath been said before. In the Sicilian registers verily it is written Off aviants the seventh time, and Agrippe the third time.

728 C. Augustus Casar VII. T. Statilius.

Affiederus putteth down for Confuls, Catilus, The Sicilian monuments, Ottowinus the eighth time, and Tarus, Dio, cefar Augustus the eighth time, and Tarus, Dio, cefar Augustus the eighth time, and Statilus Tarus the iecond time. For he had been Conful first, for apart of the year, anno 727, and now is the fecond time. of whom Suctomius writeth thus in Nero, Nero took to wife Strait Messalina, daughter (in the fourth descent) of Tarus to one who had been twice Conful, and also triumphant: he writeth also, that Augustus entred upon his eight and ninth Confular at Taruson.

C.Cefar Augustus VIII. M. Silanus.

Affiodorse sheweth for Consuls next, Cefer Angustus the eighth time, and M. Silanus. Die and the Siciliah records, Angustus the ninth time, and M. Silanus. A fragment of the capitol, Emperour cafer Angustus the ninth time, and M. Junius Silanus. This year Angustus cafar was Emperour the eight time, and shu tupths Temple of Janus the fourth time now that c-verit was thut: which he had see open before in regard of certain wars, as Die reporteth.

730 C.Cafar Augustus IX. C.Norbanus.

Chiliodorus putteth down for this years Conluls, cafar Angulpus the ninth time, and C. Norbanus. The Sicilian registers, Angulpus the tenth time, and Flaccus. Dio, and a fragment of the capitoll marble, Angulpus the tenth time, and C. Norbanus Flaccus. This Norbanus feemeth to be the fon of C. Norbanus the Conful, anno 716, for he had not the numerall more testifying a fecond Confulfaio.

731 C.Cefar Augustus X. Cn.Pifo.

Afficierus fetteth down for Confuls, Cafor Augustus the tenth cime, and Count Pifo. The Scilian records, Augustus the eleventh time, and Pifo. And Diso, Augustus the eleventh time, with Con-Calpurnius, fono of Coneus Pifo. By a fragment of the capitol flowe it appeared that Augustus entered the Confulship the eleventh time, together with Audus Terentius Varre Musrant: also that Museum died in his Magistray, in whose stead was elected Con, Calpurnius Pifor and Augustus weat out of his goovernment,
Of which matter Dis thus writeth: Augustus went to the Alban hill, and there resigned up the Consulfhip. For whereas both he himself and many others, ever fince the time that the C.W. was fet in frame and established had born the yearly Magistrats, he thought that from thence forwards he was to forbear the same to the end, that the honourable dignity of Confuls should be open to as many as might be. And this did he without the City, because he would not be hindred and letted in the action; and therewith substituted in his place Lucina Sellius, a man that of all others most affected and loved Brutus : who also wrote of his praifes and commendable parts.

M. Marcellus L. Aruntius.

This year had for Confuls, as faith Caffiodo-rus, M. Marcellus and L. Anntius: as Dio, M.Claudius fon of Marcus Marcellus, and Eferniums fon of Lucius. In the Capitoll itone these Consuls are thus set down, L. Aruntius ion of L, nephew of L, and M. Claudius fon of Marcus, nephew of M. Whereby it is given to and the Confular authority for ever So as, ar understand, that in the Sicilian records the Coniuls are not well put down to be Offavianus the twelith time, and Aruntius. In this year, the conspiracy of Fannius Capio and Varro Murana against Augustus was discovered : and the Temple of thundering Jupiter was dedicated, witnels Dio.

"He Colotian stone and Cassiodorus shew for this year Confuls, Q. Emplius Lepidus and M. Lollius, Dio writeth, when Augustus was in Sicily, and the people of Rome at the affembly for Confuls election, there arose a sedition and commotion For M. Lollius only entred upon the government, by reason that the other place was referred and kept for Augustus: but when he made refusall, Q. Lepidus was created. Of these Consuls Horace in his first book of Epiftles writeth thus:

Me quater undenos sciat implevisse Decembres, Callegam Lepidum quo dixit Lollius anno.

Know he, that 40 winters old and four, I was that year, At Rome when Conful Lolling, chofe Lepidus his feer.

A Fter Caffiedorus, the Confuls that followed for this year, were M. Apuleius and P. Silins. But in Dio, M. Apuleins fon of Sexsus, and Publius Silius fon of Publius Nerva. In the Sicilian records, Apuleius and Nerva.

He Colotian stone, Ensebins in his treatise of Times, Dio and Caffiodorus fet forth as Consuls this year, Cains Sentins, son of Cains, Saturninus and Quintus Lucretins fon of Duintus Vifbillo. Of this years confuls thus writerh Dio. Caius Sentius was declared Coniul: burfor that there was to be given him a companion, and Augustus refuted the second place of Confulthip reserved for him, there arose a fedition, untill Augustus pronounced Conful Quintus Lucretius one of the Embassadors. whom the Senat had fencunto him about the appearing of the foresaid tedition; not withstanding he was a man in times past proscribed and outlawed. The same writeth Velleins in the fecond book. In the broken Colotian stone it isto be read that the Conful elected inflead of Sentius Saturninus, was Mar Vinucius fon of Marcus. Velleius, unto Vinucius ad joyneth as Collegue, Agrippa. In this year, after the first ten years were expired, for which space Augustus together with Agrippa at the first received the Centorian authority and dignity, he was created a fecond time by the people over-feer of mens behaviour for the term of five years; and resumed the Ceniors power for the same time, all times, and in all places, he might have twelve Lictors go before him with their bundles of rods, and be allowed to take his place and fit with the Confuls.

736 Cn.Lentulus, P. Lentulus.

Du'lius Cornelius fon of Publius, Lentulus Marcellinus: and Cn. Cornelius fon of Lucius, are fet down for Confuls by the Colotian ftone table; by Die also and Caffiodowns. In this year Marcus Agrippa by the motion and authority of the Emperour Cafar Augustus, obtained of the Senat and people of Rome the Tribunitian power for five years.

C. Furnius. C. Silanus.

Here fucceeded Confuls next, according to Caffiodorus, C. Furnius and C. Silanus, After Dio, C. Furnius fon of C. and C. Tunius fon of Cains Silanus, But in the Colotian fragment C. Furnius fon of Caint, and C. Junius, Whiles C. Furnius and C. Junius Silanus were Confuls, the folemn plaies, called Seculares were now the fift time let out by Augustus, as Cenforinus and Dio affirm.

Affiodore nameth for Confuls, Lucius Domi-Sins and P. Scipio; The Sicilian secords Anobarbus and Cornelius Dio. L. Domitius fon of Lucius, nephew of Lucius, Linebar bus : and P. Cornelius fon of P. nephew of Publius Scipio : In like manner the Colotian table, wherein it standerb, that for P. . Cornelius there was substituted L.Ta. i.e. Tarius: of whom Pliny in his eighteenth book and seventh chaptes whieth thus, L. Tarins Rufus, a man most bafe for his , parentage. parentage, deferred a Confulat under August as Cafer of happy memory, only for his military fervice In this Confuls year was the Quinquennal folemnity performed, as writeth Dio, in memoriall of the Empire of Augustus; and Agripas one of the Quindecenvirs, had the ordering and fetting out thereof.

M. Drulus L. Pilo.

THe Confuls next following, were M. Drufus and L. Pilo as Callindorus faith. The Sicilian registers name them Libo and Polo. Dias M. Livin fon of Lucius, Drufus Libo; and L. Calphurnius ion of Lucius Pilo, M. Drusus ion of Marcus. L. . . according to the Colotian

740 Cn. Lentulus. M. Craffus.

"His year next following had for Confuls, A after Caffiodorus, and the Sicilian monuments, Cn. Lentulus and M. Craffus whom Dio calleth, M. Licinius fon of Marcus Craffiu; and Cn. Cornelius fon of Cnews Lentulus. The Colotian fragment showeth Marcus Licinius son of Marcus.

T. Nero. Q. Quintilius

Tiberias Nero, and P. Quintilius were Confuls this year, as Cassidorus reporteth. They are named Nero and Varus in the Sicilian Catalogue, And Dio calleth them Titus Claudius ion of Tiberius Nero: and P. Quintilius, ion of Sextus Varus. The Colorian fragment, Tike- Juls. rius Claudius ion of T. Suetonius Writeth, that Tiberius bare, his first Consulship but a sew daies. For this is that Tiberius Nero, Augustus Cafirs wives fon, who after the death of And gustus, attained to the Empire, having been first by him adopted.

rdoubt not but many of them who shall take delight and pleasure in reading the Roman story abovewritten, will presently grow into a liking of the very place, whichath afforded so worthy persons and rare examples. The love whereof hath moved many a man to undertake a voyage to Rome, only to fee the river Tyberis, those seven hils, and the monuments remaining of that famous City. The journey they have found, for may long and tedious; for expence of money heavy and chargeable; for hazard of religion, conscience and good manners, exceeding dangerous: Sofar degenerate are the inbabit ants now from that ancient people fo devout, fo vertuous and uncorrupt, in oldtime. To fatisfic the Randers in this behalf, and to avoid the perill of that travell, I thought it not amiss to bring Rome (as it were) home to them, even to represent unto their eye the Topography thereof, that is to say the description of the paces, with the memorable edifices, or rather the ruins of these antique buildings, mentioned in the flory aforesaid. Andforasmuch as Bartholmew Marlian hash herein taken pains, and made a Treasife thereof, worthy in his conceit to be dedicated unto that note Prince of famous memory, Frantis she French King, she first (I sake it) of shas name : and for that those learned men, who last set Livy forthin print, have thought good to adjoynthereto, as a necessary dependant, the foresaid Trenise; I for my part, having struggled with the difficulties of the Alps, and in some fort overcome them ; crossed Rhoine and the Poi passed over the hils Olympus and Amus, and seranled through the rough streights of Thetmopyle and Tempe, seem new I would not at my return to fick at the pleasant mounts, Pala-tine, Capitoll, Aventin, oc. with the plains and valleys between, or the river Tybet and Mats field underreats them, becaused effectedly with fuch fracts Temples, triumphane Arches, glorious Palaces, Theatres, Granes, Columns, and Coloffes, wonders of the world. And about Jound Marlian far unlike himself, and the book that goeth in his name much corruptin the print syet by conference with other Authors, I have reformed the fault, and endeavenred that our English edition might in some measure ba answerable to the Latine.

A Summary collected by John Barthelmen Marlianus, a Gentleman of Millain, touching the Topography of Rome in ancient time.

CHAP. I.

The fituation of the City.

Efore we enterprise to shew the edifices and buildings of the City of Rome, somewhat would be premised of the site thereof. Begin therefore we will at the very habitation of the immortall gods; with the invocation of whom, the Poets are wont in every hard and difficult work, to lay their first ground and make their entrance.

The Capitol hill, where it is broaded, exceedeth nor 800 foot: in length it lyeth out toward the Northwest 1500. It hash a point or wing on either side infashion of a semicircle, and in compass containeth well-near feven * furlongs

From this mount as it sunneth out in length, the Palatine hill is divided by a valley of the same breadth, or somewhat more; making a square with four angles of unequal sides, containing 1200 paces. For, the one of 600 foot boundeth upon the Capitaline hill: a fecond of fevenhundred foot, bendeth to the Northeast: the third, being almost twice as long, looketh toward the Southeast and the mount Coding: the fourth, which of all others is biggest, and comprehendeth the lifts or thew-place, called Circus Maximus, direttly regardeth the Aventine. On the fecond fide thereof there is one plain, reaching from the head and top of the Forum Rom. to the stimost skirt of the hill Quirinalis, which bendeth toward the Suburra, and taketh up in breadth 500 foot: but it lieth out in length almost a mile from both fronts, between the Capitoll, the Fre rum Nerva, and the mount Colini: in like manner from the faid mount Colins and Palatine, Sabarra and the Ejquilia, as far as to the Church of Saint Marcelline. A fecond plain there is, under the other point and top of the Capitol, near the Theatre of Marcellus, which firetcheth our 500 foot from the mount it felf as far as to the Tyber; and anon over against the valley from the crooked reach and course of the river, and the nook whereby the Avenine is disided from the Palatine, it spreadeth broader: but afterwards between the faid hils it groweth narrow, untill ve come to Caliolus and the very gate Capena, where the Aventine is parted from Caliolus only by the breadth of the street or high way. The length of this plain is likewise a mile, having on the right hand, Tyber and the Aventine; on the left, Capitoline mount, the Palatine, and Calins.

Then followeth the mount Calina (leparate from the Palatine by a plain) refembling a pyramidal form of a spire, so as the Basethereof containeth 500 foot near to the Amphitheatre. Divided also from the same it is by the street Appia, fast by the grand Cirque, which reaching to the gate Capena, leaveth on the left hand a valley 600 foot broad, between Calius and Eatiolus lying out in length 4 Stadia and within a while to the wals which joyn close to the mount Calius, as far as to the gate Afinaria. This hill then from thence lyeth along the City wall for 4 Stadia, toward the Northeast. From hence the wals meet afront for the space of two Stadia, even to the gate Nevia: from whence as they turn to the Northeast sit is parted from the Efquilia by the freet Labicana; and anon shewing it self affront near S. Marcellines, it beareth forward as far as to the Amphitheatre. Thus keeping no certain form, it taketh in circuit about 2500 paces. Moreover, the Coliolus is enclosed within the faid valley, the street Appia, and all along Northeast and Southeast, with the City wals : and hath in compals well-near a mile.

The Aventine seemeth to contain two hils; the broader part whereof toward the Tyber, and in like manner in length from Tyber along the wals, and anon near the gate Hoftienfis, is divided and cut with a crooked ffreet-way which leadeth to the angle of the grand Cirque and the mount Calius: leaving the other part thereof, divided on the right hand from the mount Calius by the ffreet Appia, untill you come to the gate Capena, It had in compais 18, Stadia, as Dionyfius also teffisieth; and on the Southeast, a most spacious and large plain of 4 unequall sides: toward the South containing almost 6 Stadia, Westward five somewhat less Eastward, but toward the Tyber not above four.

The Efquilia on the South part is divided with the fireet Labicana; on the Northwest, with the valley lying between Calius, Palatinus, and it felf; on the North the Suburra; and from the Viminal hill, the freet called Parities parteth it, untill a mancome to the bath of Dieclefian. In circuit it containeth about 4 miles, and hath no certain form; infomuch as Varro (not without good reason)thinketh it two hills, and cutteth it into many parts.

The Viminal hill on the West fide regardeth the Quirinal having about a furlong space the plain Suburra lying between: on the North it hath the valley Quirinalis. Between the same hils there lyeth as it were 4 jugera in breadth, but about a quarter of a mile in length. And anon it joyneth to the Quirinal and Efguilia along the wall of the City, by a continuall row of many arches, whereby these mountains are made even. The compass thereof taketh up two miles and an half; the form thereof is longwise, and the breadth not in every part alike, but variable.

The Quirinal mount on the left hand, directly from the tower called [Militiarum] for the space of 4 Stadia, over-looketh the levell plot of the City which lieth Westward : but on the right hands (as clearly appeareth by that which we have faid) it is opposite to the Viminalis: on the third side Northward for the space of 6 Stadia, it lieth to the hill called [Hortulorum.] It hath a valley lying between, in breadth 4 jugera, reaching near to the gate Salaria: and in the whole compass it taketh almost three miles.

Next to it is the little hill Hortulorum, although it flandeth without the old pomary of the city: for the space of 3 Seadia it beareth over the valley Martia lying between it and Tyber, It carrieth in length along the wall of the City, from the gate Flumentana to Collina, a full mile more than any other fides. The circumference thereof is much about 18 Stadia.

There remaineth now the mount Janiculus, on the other fide of Tyber: the one half there and not above, is contained within the walls: from the Vatican plain, for the space of 3 Stadia, whereas it fretcheth toward the South if adjoyneth to the river: the other part thereof is enclosed within the walls, for the compais of five Stadia.

Moreover, above the Vatican plain, there is a little hill of the same nature, which putteth forther two points like horns; the one toward Janiculum, the other Northward, much like a bow full bent: the convexity or outward compals whereof containeth a mile,

Now will we run over the plain and base plot of the City: which beginning at the Capitol hill near the gate Flaminia, at this day on the Northeast fide (or rather the North) comprehendeth ai Diameter of race almost of 8 Stadia, environed with the hils Quirinalis and Hortulorum: but on the West fide, the Tyber runneth by it, where along the banks thereof it beareth a greater space. Moreover by a streight and direct line being drawn for two Stadia from the hill Hortubrum, and namely, where it over-looketh the Piere of Domitian Called Namachia: along the bank of Tyber ris, over-against the Pile Hadriani, it maketh a quadrangle of four uneven fides, containing within it more than three miles : without which square is left the valley Martia, namely as much as lieth between the hill Hortulorum, the wall of the City, and Tyberis : so as the bredth draweth narfower fill unto the gate Flaminia.

There resteth yet the Translyberin region, which rogether with the Janiculum, taketh in compass about three miles. This will be more easily observed and marked by the very channell of Trberis; which entring into the city, keepeth his course directly on the right hand of the gare Flaminia through the vale Martia, and soon after by little and little turneth from the North. Westward, and representeth the form of a semicircle, in the convexity whereof is the Vatican, and within the concavity, the Mars field, Moreover, beneath the Moles or pile [Hadriani] returning to his former course, as tar as to the utmost foot of the Aventine, winding somewhat crooked into the South, not far from the gate Portuenfis it runneth forth of the city.

Thus much concerning the fituation and form of Rome, and the plot wherein it standeth, which at this day is so far changed, that hardly a man may find any token or memoriall of it, as it was in old time.

CHAP. II. Of the founders of the City of Rome, the KK, and Inhabitants thereof.

He region (on which Kome was after built) West of Tyber, a hundred and forty furlongs distant from the sea, the Sicilians (by constant report) first inhabited, Afterwards, the Aborigines leaving Arcadia, by the conduct of Oenorius the ion of Lycaon, came into the faid quarters: and being grown into a liking of the place for the fertility thereof, they expelled the Sicilians, and held it for their own use. In process of time the Pelasgians, a people of Greece, together with the Theffalians, who came to aid the Aborigines against the nations their neighbor borderers, remained also in these parts (with the good will and contentment of the said Aborigines Juntill the Trojan war: but they all retained the name of the Aborigines, which prerogative they held because they were the first, that by arms conquered that seignory and kingdom, Long time after, Saturn being chased out of Crete by Jupiter his son fled into Italy: where he taught Janus the King of the Aborigines the skill of planting vineyards, with the use thereof, and likewise the handling of the fickle: in regard of which good turn, he was freely feoffed by Janus in part of his realm, yea, and after the decease of Janus enjoyed the kingdom alone. After this, the Arcadians, who for sook the city Palantium (as weary of their own native country) and by the leading of Evander seeking some other place of habitation, arrived at the place where now Rome standeth; received of Faunus the K, of the Aborigines, a portion of ground; built a fort upon a little hill not far from Tyber, and named it Palantium, in remembrance of their native city which they had abandoned. After all this, the Peloponnenans, Phanetians, and Epians, by reason that Elis their native country was wasted before by Hercules, were by him brought away into Italy, and they planted themselves upon the mount Saturnine. These men lived along time according to their own laws and customs, untill they being vanquished and subdued by the Aborigines, were incorporated by them into one Commonalty. Then raigned Latinus the fon of Faunus, untill fuch time as Eneas the fon of Anchifes, after the overthrow and final ruin of Ilium, after many adventures and much variety of fortine, which he had endured together with the Trojans his companions, came by the inflinct of the destinies to K. Latinus. Whose daughter Lavinia he took to wile, and so was by Latinus admitted into the fociety and fellowship with him of the kingdom. When the Aborigines and the Trojans were thus linked and joyned together, he called both nations by the name of Latines. Then Was Anens warred upon by Turnus : for that he had married Lavinia, who was espouled and affianced to him before. But Aneas won the victory, and in fingle combat flew Turnus. At that time also Latinus died, and left his son in law Eneas heir to the crown. certain years after was Eneas killed by Mezentius K, of the Tuscans; and Ascanius his son succeeded in the kingdom. He built the towns Lavinium and Alba: and when he departed this life, made over the crown to his brother Sylvius, After him followed Kings, Eneas Sylvius, Latinus Sylvius, Alba, Atys, Capys, Capetus, Tyberinus Agrippa, Romulus, Aventinus, Procas, and Amulius. This Amulius usurped the kingdom by fraud, which in right of eldership was due to his brother Numitor. And for sear least there might arise from his brothers off-spring, some one to make claim and recover the royall seat, and the soy himself be thrust out of his place, he consecrated Rhea the daughter of Namitor to Vesta, for to be a protested Nun, She being thus made a votary, and devoted to perpetuall virginity, hapned to be with child by Mars, and was delivered of two boies, twins, namely, Romulus and Remus. Amulius advertised hereof, commanded both the babes to be cast forth to perish. Found they were by Faustulm a shepheard upon the bank of the river Tyber, and by his wife Faustula fostered and brought up among other shepheards. Remus being grown to mans estate, was taken by certain thieves and robbers, and brought to K. Amulius his great-uncle. Accused he was, for that he used to ratie booties and drive away whole droves of Numitor his cattell. Whereupon delivered he was to Numitor for to be punished according to his discretion. But Remus after much discourse of speeches to and fro, was by certain tokens found and known to be Numiter his daughters fon., And at the very time came Romaliu also with Faustulus in place, purposing to rescue Remuchis brother. Soon they entred into a conspiracy, and at unawares surprized and murdered Amulius: and so restored their grandire Numitor. In the second year of Numitor his reign, Romulus and Remse built the City of Rome, in the very place where they had been laid forth to periff, which was the 432 year after the winning of Troy, and the twelfth day before the calends of May. Afterwards in a fray that arose between Romulus and Remus striving for the soveraignty, Remus Came by his death, and then Romulus gave name both to the City and Citizens also of Rome,

CHAP. III. The form and bigness of the City of Romulus

Omalin let out the City fourfquar, as Plutareb witnesseth: whereupon of some it is called Quadrata, Others affirm, that the form and compais thereof is uncertain, and by reason of Antiquity unknown at this day. The hill Palatinus was by Romalus first fortified, because therein he was brought up: at the foot thereof began the Pomorium, Afterwards the Capitol and the Roman Forum were laid to it.

The City began to be marked and bounded out from the bealt-market s from whence in certain. places were stories pitched and set between, along the bottom of the mount Palatine, as far as to the altar of Confus: and so within a whileto the old Curie: then, to the Chappell of the Larce and the Roman Forum the bounds were extended, untill a place was affigned for the wals, and a spacious plot to build the City upon:

Titus Tatim began the wall from the rock Carmentalis, and brought it to the way, which is not far from, Tyber, From therice, Southward unto the farthest part of the grand Cirque: and so Northeast-ward he ranged it into the Forum of Nerva; and in the end joyned it to one of the points of the Capitol hill, and within it compassed both the Capitolit self, and also the Palatine, And finally, to enlarge the City, he fet to it the hils Quirinalis and Calins. digit who

CHAP. IIII. The gates of Romulus his City.

R Omulus when he died, left the City of Rome with three gates, namely, Carmentalis, Romana, and Pandana. Others add a fourth thereto, to wit, Janualis, Carmentalis took the name of Carmenis the mother of Evander, whose Chappel Carmentale flood before the gate. This gate flood under the Capitol on the right hand, between the cliff Tarpeins and the Tyber, over-against the Church now of S Katherine, toward the shew-place Flamininius; This was afterwards named Scelerata, for that without this gate, in the Temple of Janus, the act of Senat passed, for the sending of the three hundred Fabii to Cremera, who went forth at this gate, and were flain every one at Cremera.

Romana was to called of Romulus: built it was where now the gardens are belonging to the new Church of S. Mary not far from the angle of the mount Palatine, in the bottom of the cliff of Villaria. Some affirm, that this gate was afterwards called Mugonia, of the lowing of kine and oxen: others name is Trigonia, of three corners that it had.

Pandana was so named, because it stood open for things to be brought through it into the City. The famoalfo was called Libera or Romulida. The place for it they affigned where the gate Saturmiastood, bearing the name of the old City, so called and after destroye

Tannalis carried the name of the Temple Janus, which is not far off, Ie Rood sometime at the very foot of the hill Viminalis,

The variety of the compass and walls of the City.

Then the Romans one while made war upon their neighbor nations of Italy, and otherwhiles defended themselves against their violence, it hapned for the most part that they got the upper hand, and ever as they vanquished any and subdued them under their subjection, in the end made them Citizens of Rome: by which occasion, the City built by Romulus, was not fufficient to receive fo great a multitude. Tullius therefore after his conquest of the Sabins and Albans laid to the City the mountain Calini and the Efquilia, and so enlarged it. Asterwards, when Politorium was won, and a number of the inhabitants translated to Rome ; Ancus made a second enlargement of the City, and granted thesenew commers the mount Avenine to inhabit. The old Romans therefore dwelt in Palatine; the Sabins in Capitolium ; the Albans in Calini; and this new come multitude in Aventine. But after the Latines also were received into the City, they joyned Janicalus allo to the city by a woodden bridg made over the Tyber; and cast a trench cal-led Foss a Quiritium, about the low and levell places of the city. So the Trans-tyberine quarter was united to the city, and made it more spacious and stately : last of all, Servius Tullius by adjoyning the hils Viminalis and Quirinalis to the five abovenamed, amplified the city. And as before it was mounded about with rubbish, and the same rudely laid, Tarquin the proud was the first that enclosed is with a wall of good ashler stone. And the very same wals which stand at this day, were by the pollerity that followed, repaired and reedified upon the old foundations. But the city in old time, when as it flourished in greatest glosy, extended far more in bounds and compals. For in Plinier time shecircuit thereof within the wall contained about 20 miles. But in these daies hardly 12. And the whole compais of the city, with the suburbs and buildings about and without the walls (which although they spred far, were comprehended yet under the name of city) in the said Plinies time, was 50 miles.

CHAP. VI. The Pomery of the City.

Hat void frace of ground within and without the walls, which might not lawfully be either That void fpace of ground within and without the wants, wanten magnetic activities of the whole ploughed or inhabited, is called Pomory. And formetime it is put for the circuit of the whole ploughed or inhabited, is called Pomory. And sometime it is put for the circuit of the whole ploughed or inhabited, is called Pomory. And sometime it is put for the circuit of the whole City. This Pomery was oftentimes let out farther and altered by the Roman Emperors, But none had power granted fo to do, save only they that either conquered somewhat to the Roman dominion, or endowed the City with some singular and especiall benefit; as the Emperor Claudius and many more. And like as the Romans had no certain limits of their Empire, fo no let bounds confined either the City or the Pomæry.

CHAP. VII.

The gates of old Rome, which at this day are not to be feen: those also that are now extant.

m Ven}$ as the bounds of the City and ${f Pomerium}$ were many times altered, fo the gates also fome were left within the City, by occasion that the walls were farther set out and lost their names: othersintime were so old, that they fell down, and albeit their name remain, yet the place where they flood is not known. Some again were made new, and took either new names. or else kept their old: others changed the place, and held their old name: and finally, there were fome that had two names; and others, more. And these in manner were all the names of the Flumentana,or Fl.sminia. Nument and or Viminalis.

Quirinalis, Agonenfis, or Collina.

Esquilina or Touring.

Janualis, or Sabiufu, leading into the Sabins country, Navia Of Labicana

Capena, or App a. Tergemina or Hoftienfis. Ratumena or Vientana.

Calimontana or A finaria. Portuenfis, or Navalis.

Triumphalis, or Vaticana. Carmentalis, Magonia, Pandana, Querquetulana, Raduscula, Saginalis, Saucualis, Collatina, Interaggeres, Tiburtina, Gabinfa, Latina, Aurelia, Catularia, Laurentia, Fontinalis, Lavernalis, Ferentina, Minutina, Saluta is, Mutta, Piacularis, Prenestina, Libitinensis, Valeria, and Tarpeia. Flumentanatook name of the river Tyberis for it flood at the first upon the bank of that river, not far from the bridg of Xystus in the end of the Broad fireet, and at the head of the way or fireet Flaminia: but afterwards, translated it was to the place where now it standeth. In time following, it was called Flaminia, of the causey of Flaminius: at this day it is named, The peoples gate, and is htuate in the hill Hortulorum, Collatina bare the name of Collatia; a town not far from Rome : now it is Pinciana, of one Pinciana m a Senator, whole name it keepeth. This also standeth in the hill Hortulorum: betweenit and Flument ana is a mile space.

Quirinalis took name of the Chappel of Quirinus: or because in old time the way lay through it for them that went to the hill Quirinalis. It feemeth to be called Agonenfis, quali ayer@, i.e. without a corner; afterwards, Collina: and at the last, Salaria; for that by it salt was carried into the City. This name it holdeth fill and flandeth 6 Stadia from Collatina, Viminalis 15 from Quirinalis diffant 5 Stadia; to named, as they fay, of a wood of Oliers, which (as ic is supposed) sometime grew thereby: or else, of a Chappell of Jupi Vimineus. This also men called Figulenfis, of the potters works made without it: but now they name it the gate of S, Agnes, and Namentana.

Interuggeres standeth in the Plain Viminalis, between the gate Viminalis and Esquilina: it had the denomination of Tarquinius his mures and banks, among which it was built, Tiburtina flood between Efquilina and Numentana, so as it was 12 Stadia diffant from Efquilina, upon the plain of Efquilia in the very place where the conduit is of the Mary water.

Efquilina took that name of the hill Efquilia, the same in ancient time was called Taurina, of a buils head therefound: for many a day after was the faid bulls head feen painted in the inner front of the laid gate, At this day, S. Laurence gate, Navia drew the name of certain *groves of woods near adjoyning. In times past Labicana, and now Major, An archthere was so called and erected in the same place by the old Romans.

Calimontana, standing from Navia & Stadia, feemeth by affinity of name to be so called of the hill Calins, in the edge whereof it standeth : and Asinaria it was called, of the Asses which were wont to be fent out to Naples, by that gate, At this time they call it S. Johns gate.

Gabinfa, built close to the mount Calius, Southeast: which feemeth by all likelihood to take the name of the City Gabii, which it directly regardeth. It carried the name also Metrodium, of measuring and is fituat from Calimontana, as it were 5 Stadia.

Latina is 5 Stadia likewite from Gabinfa, feated not far from the Church of S. John Baptift: 10 called for that men go forth of it into Latium.

Capena is so named of the Capenats, a Latine nation, against which it lyeth. This also is called fill Camana, of a grove and Chappel of the Muses, built just before the same gate. Appia likewife, of the high-way Appia; which Appias the Cenfor paved, and so it bare his name. They call it allo Triumphalis, for that in triumph the pomp is that way carried with flate, Of some it is named Pominalia, for the plenty of fprings there. At this day S. Sebaftians gate.

Tergemina took that name of an old gate fo called, at which the 3 twins Haratii went forth ac gainst their enemies, and gave the first name to it. Some shew remaineth yet of this gate to be icen, ocer the Salina.

Hostiensis, was in ancient daies so called, for that it led to the City Hostia: now S. Pauls gate s fituate it is from Capena wel-neer 8 Stadia.

Portuenfis is a gate beyond the Tyber, within half a Seadium of the faid river; fo called for that it leadeth to the haven of Hostia. Now a-daies men call it, Portaripa, i. The bank gate.

Aurelia, looketh toward Janiculum; distant from the former almost 7 Stadia. In this age they call it S. Pancrace gate.

Aalia, was built by Alim Hadrianus, of whom it took that name.

Septimiana, bare the name of Septimius the Emperor: and because it standeth under Janiculum, is at this day called, Subrus Janum. Some affirm, that this is Fontinalis, because out of the mount called Aureus, there iffue fountains : for to the faid hill this gate standeth close, From it to Aures lia are 5 Stadia; and to the river Tyber 7 jugera or acres.

Thus much for the gates of the City of Rome, and their names.

The wall in old time had upon it 360 turrets. Some of these are decaied and gone; others repaired, and many this long time are ready to fall.

NOw is it time, and the course of the Story doth require, that leaving the towrs and walls, we enter into the City, and shew the beginning and the place of those edifices, which within the walls, either upon the hills or the plain plot of the City, were built by men in old time. First therefore, begin we will at the worthieft earthly habitation of all their Gods, to wit, the Capitol.

The second Book.

The fundry names of the Capitol.

"He Capitol was by the old Romans called Mount Saturnius, either of a City named Satura ma, which under the very hill was built in that place where now Rome flandeth: or because Saturn in times past dwelt in that hill: or elie (as some think) for that the mount it self had Saturn for the tutelar God and Protector therof: But afterwards it was named the mount Tarpeius, of the Virgin Tarpeia, of whom Livy writeth, Last of all, Tarquinus Prifeus going in hand to build upon that hill a temple to Jupiter, when he digged for to lay the foundation chanced to find in the bottom of the trench a mans head; whereupon they called it Capitolium, And the Augurs being fought unto and demanded; What the finding of that head might fignify? answered. That this Castle should be the See of the empire and the head of the whole world. This · hill they divide into the Caftle and the Capitol. The Caftle they built Northward, as a Bronger and more fortified place : but the Capitol, toward Tyberis, a place naturally defended.

CHAP. II. Who first laid the foundation of the Capitol: who sinished it: how often it was burnt, and by whom reedified.

I.M. the Sabine war, Tarquinius Prisens vowed to build the Capitol temple: but after the war was ended, to foon as he had laid the ground-work, he died. After him, Tangainius Superbus finished the building, of 4 square stone: and destraied the charges thereof out of the pillage of Pomacia, a Town that he won. When he for his tyranny was banished Rome; Horatius Pulvillas the Conful dedicated the faid Capitol to Topico: It food upright and found for the space of $15 years, until the Marian wars, and then (in the Confulhip of Scipio and Warbo) it was consumed with fire. Syllate-edified it, and Q. Catulai confectated it and to it continued until the Vitellian war. During which troubles, it was a fecond time burne, at what time it flood with the dores Shur, undefended, and not rifled . Veftafian builties agains and in his life, a third time it was destroiced by fire; and together with the Gapitol Veft usan allo himselfedied; Afterwards; Dominian rebuilded it in more magnificent and stately manner shart is had been ever before, and disburfed thereing bove 12000 falents. Of the Capitol tourets and pinackes, the flatues and images fmitten with thunder-bolts and blafted oftentimes with lightning, divers writers have made mention.

that of Jupiter Fereivins, vowed by Romains in the war against the Cenenians. After which was ended, and he returned to Rome with victory, he reased a temple in the very pitch and son of the capitof hill. But Tupher was by Romains named Feretrius, as some would have it; for that Inoner affifted him in firiking the enemy, in that very place where he vowed the temple. Or ele. because the Romans used in making of peace, to swear by his scepter and the flint. The roof of this Church faln down for very age and through neglect of the Romans, Augustus repaired. This temple first built by Romulus, was afterwards enlarged by Anous Martins,

But the temple of Inv. Opt. Max. of all other was the greatest and most renowned. This also was called Capudinum; and Targ. Prifous vowed it. After him, Targ. Superbus expended in the foundation thereof 40000 pound weight of filver ; but before that he finished it, he was deprived of his Kingdom for his tyranny, and left the work unperfect to be accomplished by the Romans, Built it was upon the hanging of the Capitoline hill toward Tyberis, as hath been shewed before. For the form, the greatness and beauty of this temple read Diony fins and fundry other authors, who have written of the Roman acts and of Rome it felf. Upon the top or lantern thereof. Rood Summanus the God, made of potters earth, whose head was smitten with lightning and tell into Tyberia. It had within it belides, a fanctuary or fecret chappel, which no Lay person might enter into. Within the faid cell or chappel, were two coronets of gold: the one of them the Gauls confecrated to Inp. Opt. Maximus: the other, the Carthaginians fent to Romein the honer of Inpiter, in token of joy for their victory over the Samnits. Morever, in the faid temple were other three chappels, to wit, one of In p. Opt. Max. in the mids; a fecond of Mineresa on the right hand; and a third of Iuno on the left. And because men in old time attributed unto Minerva the invention of numbers, a law was fet down in writing, That the chief and highest Pretor for the time being, should drive a spike or great nail neer unto her image, whereby the computation of the years might be known. This fo rich and costly edifice, was burnt all at once in the Vitelijus war. Now at this day the place wheras it flood, is prophane: howbeit there remain yet tob feen, some tokens thereof, and the foundations; but all deformed and broken peecemeal.

CHAP. IV.

The Temples of Saturn, Jupiter Tonans, Jupiter Cuflos, of Fortune, of Vejovis, Mercy, Juno Moneta, and of Janus. The Sepulchre of Oreftes, the common Treasury, the house of Manlius, and chappel of Carmenta.

Since that we have described the temple of Jupiter K. of the Gods, in what place it was fivust, and by whom built; meet in is to make report also of other gods in order, who had their houses in the capitol: and first of Saturd, supiters father,

Saturn in old time had an altar exected unto him in the very way as ye go out of the Forum up to the capitol, as somethink. There be, that would have this temple or altar of gaturn, built by the companions of Hercules: others again (ay, that Taxins reared it, But of this variety in opinion of Writers, this may be the reason, because some affirm, that there were two temples consecrated to Saturn, but reared in divers places and at feveral times: one at the rock of Carmenta, even before the capitoline cliff (whereinethe bones also of Orestes brought from Aricia were bestowed:) . the other in that very place, where now standeth the chappel of S. Saviour: where yet at this day there is a turret to be seen, which they call, the Tower in Erarium: for there first was the common treasure house of Rome. In the temple of Saturn, dedicated by Catulus Luctatius, there stood I anus with four faces: fignifying the four times of the year: of whom the first month I anuary took

The temple of Iupiter Tonans Augustus Cafar first built, on the capitoline cliff or side of the hill, South-east supon this occasion: It happed, that in the Cantabrian expedition, as he was carried by night in a litter, the lightning flightly glanced thereupon, and killed the fervant that was the guide ; and therefore he both vowed this temple, and also finished it to the honor of Thundring-Inpiter. A temple also to Fortune was built not far from it.

The temple of Ferous, flood between the castle and the capitol, in that part where now the chappels are to be feen of confervators. In old time they called this Idol-devil, Vejovis, because he was deprived of all power to help and dogood. To him they facrificed a the goat : because he held arrows in his hand, most menchought he was Apollo,

African, that is to fay, the temple of Mercy stood likewise upon the capitol hill, neer a shadowy groves in the very valley amid the capitol; and the caftle. Called it is the comple Intermonting between two okerows. This, Romainne recited that what offender foever thicher flet, he should bepriviledged as in a fanctuary. But Tyberius afterwards Juppoling that this place ministred occasion of mischief, deprived it of that liberty. This African, by report, the posterity of Hercules

The temple(as also themint-house) of Iuno Monte was built upon that plot of ground, where fomtime flood the house of M. Munling. This chappel fome report that L. Furius vowed; others, that L. Cicereius the Pretor; and Ovid, that Camillus. Now was Inno called Moneta, of giving warning: for that from the very place where afterwards the temple was fet, there was a voice heard of Inno, admonifying them of the future overthrow by the Sationes, In this place now flandeth a Senators house of Rome.

The temple of James keeper of the Capitoline caltle, stood in that place, whereat that day is the goal and prilon for malefactors and fellons, toward the Southwest, over- gainst the Forem Romanum. This Janus upon the Capitol, Romulus and Tasius devited to have two faces prelenting therby the two nations. Others would have him to be pourtraied 2 faced, for his cumping and providence; for he was the first that invented the roiall crown; also boats; the skill of navigation; bralen cain and many other things. Janut took that name ab anndo, of going, for that he turneth about the heaven and all things elie. For which cause he also named Vertumans, a lo old time they believed there was but one Jann; but polterity in laterage, have imagined more.

The temple of Jupiter (uftos, Domitsan (after he was invested in the empire) built: and placed his own image in the lap and cofome of that god, It flood where at this day the Salang or faltone are, neer to the temple of Tanas,

CHAP. V. The temple of gods which have no certain place now in the Capitol.

Mong those gods, whose determinat place assigned to them in the Capitol, is not known A Mong those goos, whose westerning as to whom in all the world throughour, there is no where it was, the first was Terminar, as to whom in all the world throughour, there is no whom it was the first was the firs proper place appointed. Now this Terminas was a rude and formlets stone. Unto him Taisas first vowed a temple: and some say, that Nama de dicated it. How ever it be; no doubt verily ancient it Was, as casily may be collected by that which followeth. But why, that in the Capitol was of men in old time reputed tor a god, this was the cause : when Tarquinins Superbus determined to build a temple to Jupiter, he confulted with the Augurs about the place, because he would begin nothing without the approbation of the birds. They the wed unto him the mount Tapeins, but this place was already taken up with other gods, whole chappels there, were conferrated and hallowed. These therefore were by certain i crifices to be conjured out from thence, fortogive way to Impiter, and to be translitted into some other quarter. All the gods willingly yeelded their places up to Jupiter as their K, only Terminus refuted to be displaced; and foremained there still When he had finished the temple and fore-part of the roof which regardeth the faid thone, was left naked and open for that god, as who neither ought nor could be encloted, the augures therfore being sought unto and demanded, For what reason Terminus slone abode still with Jupiter, when all the other gods were gone ? made answer, that thereby fignified, that together with religion. their empire allo was eternall. To this god they facrificed not but in open air and publickly abroads as being the god and keeper of bounds. Saint Angustine witnesseth, that Mars allo and Juvenius together with Terminas Would not agree to give place to Jupiter : for that the dominion of Rame should not be bounded out, nor yet decay with age and continuance of time.

To Mars and Venns Ericina, Attilus and Q. Fab. Max. being Dnumvirs, dedicated chappels upon the Capitol, fevered afunder by one vault or ciftern.

To queen June, C. Flaminius in the Ligurian war, vowed a temple.

To Ops, Tatins the K. confecrated a temple ; for that the is called the earth, and is the mother of all things, as bringing forth all, and receiving all again. The fame Ops is called Maia, Fauna and Bona Dea, This temple was blatted with fire from heaven, as Livy tellifieth

Mars revenger, Augustus Cafar erected a temple upon the Capitol, within the hill Saturning. To Faith, on the same hill, Atteline Collainne dedicated another.

To Health, Concord, Liberty, and Victory, they built temples : and many there were within the city erected to Concord.

To Fortuna Primigenia and Obsequence, Tullus dedicated a temple.

To Venus-bald they also set up a temple in the Capitol, in memorial and everl sting praise of the Roman dames, for willingly parting with the hair from their heads, toward the making of engins, that during the Gauls war, were deviled and made against the enemies.

Tarquinius Superbus built a temple to Jupiter Sponfor, and Sp. Poftbumius dedicated it, Like-

CHAP. VI. Of the flatues which either in old time were et new remain in the Capitol.

F statues in old time were fundry forts, and the same made of divers m tter: some of marble. some of brasse, some of filver, and others of gold. Many of these were set up in the capitol to the immortal gods for divers causes, and namely, for their benefits bestowed upon mankind; which a long time were honoured and worthipped. To noble men likewite and fuch as had deferred well of the common-weal, the utual maner was in old time to let up flatues and images in the temples, to provoke others by their example to do the like.

To Jupiter in the Capitol, Sp. Carvilius erected a flattie in his teamle, after he had vanquished the Samnits, taking the proportion or formthereof by the pattern of upiter Latterine in image! Flores maketh mention, that this statue was smatten with lightning. He also set up anothered thundring Japiter,

An image there was of Janus likewife in the Capitol, holding in his right hand the number of 200 and in his left of fixty five, to fignific the daies of the yeer.

Two golden statues of Caffor and Pollna, were by the Emperor Claudius of famous memory. dedicated in the temple of Tupiter.

The counterfeits refembling the rivers, Nilm and Tygris, half naked, were fet up in the forefront of the temple of Conversators: the one cary upon the shoulders, Sphysix: the other a Tygre; two wild beafts; both of them hold in their right hand Cornneopia, which by lifteth plenty.

The personage of Herenles pourtraied naked of braffe and double guilt, without beard holding in his right hand a club, and in the left the golden Apples of Helperides, was found near the Greek ichool and the beatt market, in the ruins of Ara Maxima.

There be certain portraitures also of the Parthian and Dacisn triumphs, enclosed within wals which were taken out of the church now called S. Martina.

Of the Capitol cliff. Tarpeia rock, the flene of Carments, and the gate Sigrcoraris.

IN old time, they called that place and way whereby men go up to the Capitol. Clivus Capito-Itelians : but where that place was in times path, fundry opinions there be. Some affirm, that it lay toward that part of the hill which looketh to the Accenting, where now frandeth & Gregories Church in Velabrum nothers between the temples of Saintrius, and Concerdia, near to the arch of Severus, and at the fluid and flandings, called Senatoris Stabula, Now the arch of Severus was raited at the foot of the Capitol hill, in the very head and top of Forum Remainum: under which they passed, that in triumph ascended up into the Capitol. The Capitol cliff then, was neer unto the Roman Forum: which by the Cenfors was paved with flint : who alfo fet up a gallerie from the Chappell of Sature unto the Capitol Temple clote to the Sevaculum and the Caria over it. Corn. Tacinus writeth, that in former times there were many avenues and waies upon the Capitol, and thereupon arole to many and divers opinions concerning the Clivus Capitolinus. In the place of the feat Floralia was in old time celebrated, wheref fome tokens remain at this day to be feen. In it flood Miles houle, which was full of flields and other armor, Cicero maketh report.

Of tables, of the brasen columns or pillars, and of the silver Goofe.

N the Capitol there were two forts of tables; the one of Pictures containing the noble acts or battels, with the fiege and affault of Cities, exploited by valiant martial men. For some of them were fo defirous of praile and renown, that they could not be content to behold their own ftatues erected in the Capitol, unlesse their acts were described also and depainted in tables set up in publick place; and by that means left their glory behind them, commended likewife to posterity. Another kind there was of tables, wherein were written in the most ancient laws, to wit, of Remn'us, Numa, and the other KK. Likewife the statues of the later lawgivers : the publick acts and ordinances; the leagues and covenants with other nations; the facted rites and divine fervice, and the ancient records and monuments, which were engraven and cut in braien tables : of which, fome at this day are extant; others by continuance of time, by war, fire, and careleffe negligence are loft and perished. For the keeping of these, there were certain persons appointed, that in so serious and important matters, there should be no forgery and corruption.

Pillars like wife of braffe, were by Domittan fet up in the Capitol; the which, Augustus the conqueror of Egypt, caused (of many brasen beak heads of ships molten together) to be made into four huge columns, and brought them to Rame. There are besides, many other antiquities within the Capitol, cut in tables of brasse and marble both, and namely, Epitaphs, which here for brevities sake are left out.

Of cortain edifices and buildings upon the Capitol hill, and of other things in general.

N Ow that we have made declaration of the states, tables, and columns, worth the noting something by the way would be said in the place, as touching the ancient houses there. The court called Calabra Curia, Romalus built the Capitol, and covered it with reed. Into this place the King-lacrificer was wont to affemble the Senat and people of Rome, that from him they might learn and know the daies of folemn game, plaies, and facrifices.

Not far from the faid Curia, was the cottage of Romains,

And almost the same place stood the flately porch or gallery of Metellas and Conflautions. The Library also called Majorum, built atificially upon marbles pillar a and besides the publick court-

There was an hallowed place like wife upon the Capitol, from whence they gathered Verbena, or facred heros, to make garlands for the facials heralds and the Paterbarratus: wherewith they were crowned when they purposed either to make any accord and peace, or to proclaim war.

The flint Rone also was here found, which they held in their hand when they sware by Jupiter, pronouncing these words, If I made default with my houseledg, then let Diespiter cast me out of all there (faving the City and the castle) as I burt from me this Hone.

The Capitol had certain vaults like citterns, into which were thrown all things over-word. or fo old that they were good for nothing. The books also of Sebilla were kept in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, byten Wardens in a fone ceffer under the ground. Over & befides to many edifices were there, to beautiful was the Capitol, and the riches thereof io great, io many goodly ornaments and fhrines of the gods most artificially wrought, that right worthilv of men in old time, it was called the earthly habitation of the gods & Jupiter himfelt. For during the upright and flourishing state of Rome; so curiously built and richly beautified it was a that as heaven surpasseth the earth, to far this edifice went beyond all other works and wonders whatfoever of the world; infomuch as it feemed to have been built by the gods: fo far furmounted it all the device and reach of mans wit. But as excellent as these things sometimes were. now at this day they are to be feen, all naked, forlorn, and detolate.

CAHP. XI

The Temple of Concord, and Jupiter Stator : moreover what the Curia is Between the Capitol hill and mount Palarine, there lyeth a valley, whereof we have spoken before. The Temples and buildings wherof, as also the places behind the Capitol, by order and course we are now to describe. In this valley therefore the temple of Concord deserved to be visiten first : which word, being derived (as it were) from the unity and agreement of heart, maintaineth, augmenteth, and preferveth alone, all things in the world whatfoever.

A temple to this Comcord, Camellus vowed, in case he could reconcile the Commons to the Nobles. When as therfore the people were brought into grace and favour again with the Nobility, he built the church of Concord, beginning above the Comittum and fo forward unto the Forum. The porches belonging to this temple, are yet to be feen at the foot of the Capitol. From it, there was an alcent of an 100 steps up to the chappel of Juno Moneta. That temple of Concord, faln in long time to decay, was afterwards by the Senat reedified. Therein many a time the Senat met and fat in counfell, and orations were made unto the people. In this also there was a vault or shrondunder the ground, wherein oftentimes theeves, armed men, cutters and backfters were kept as in a prison, untill the affemblies of the people were dismissed. This house had many statues and images curionly and cunningly wrought, namely, of Jano, Apollo, and of Latona, bearing and holding her two babes Apollo, and Diana, Like wife of Afonlapine and * Hygia, the handy work of Niceratus Allo of Jupiter Ceres, and Minerva: likewife of the Dames weeping and adoring the faid images all made of Stones. Moreover, the images of Mars and Mercarie; the workmanship of Pefferates, Alio of Marfras-bound, made by Zenxis the painter Likewilefather Liber and Caffandra, painted by Theodorus. As for the image of Victory in the porch and entrance of the faid temple, it is to be feen how it was imitten with a thunderbolt,

To Impiter Stator, Romulus in the Sabine war vowed a temple, that he might flay the flight of the Romans: whereupon be was called, the upholder of the Roman state. Therefore after victory obtained, he built a temple at the foot of the Palatine hill, just over-against the church of Cenegrdia, where at this day be most high battlements of wals. In this bouse also, like as in that other of Concord, the Senat affembled oft, Likewife in other temples. The courts, wherein the Senat gathered together in Councel, were temples all, and therein were there acts made : but in the facred churches of the gods, neither met the Senat, nor any orations were made to the people. This temple of Stater was burnt to the ground in that fire of Nerves making, and never after reedified.

CHAP. XII. The temple and grove of Vella: the temple of Faith and of Romulus

He temple of Vesta was built by Romalus, between the Capitol and the Palatine hils, not far I from the Forum Romanum; whereat this day is to be feen, the church of S. Mary of graces, Neer unto it the palace of Nama was built. The Roman Pontifies, when they would consult of great matters concerning religion, met in the court-yard of Veffa; like as the Senat and people of Rome, debated in councel of their weightielt affairs within the temple of Fath. Now this was a most ancient temple built in Palatium by Romalus, or, as some will have it, by Name

There was a grove also confecrated to Veffa; which reached from the root of the Palatine as far as to the large street called Novavia. Out of that grove (before Rome was taken by the Gauls) a voice was heard, giving warning that the City should be lost, unlesse the wals and a ses were re-

The temple of Romalus was leated at the foot of mount Palatine, in the midft of that fide which regardet the Capitol, in that very place were now the church is of S. Theodore. In this faid temple there is a most ancient monument, the portraiture of the she wolf, yeelding her teats unto the founders of the City, to be sucked.

CHAP. XIII Lupercal, and the figeres Ruminalis.

"He Lupercal was a cave at the bottom of the Palatine hill, overspread and covered with trees having springs deep beneath under the rock. In the most inward and secret place of this cave

there was an altar confectated to Pass, But artouching the etymology and derivation of the name, as also of the situation thereof, there go divers opinions; for as in times past the place was close hidden and unfrequenced, to now it is inhabited on every fide ; infomuch as there remaineth no mark and token at all where Lapercal was, Howbeit the greater part of writers affirm, that it was in that quarter of the City, where at this day S. Theodors church is feen, For to this place upon a time the Tybre overflowing, made a creeke thither: and hard by it was, where the two infants were call forth. In the Lupercal therefore, certain authors confidently avouch, that Romelus and Remas were laid to perifh, and fo carried by water to the place called afterwards Ruminalis, were under a fig-tree there, nourished by a she wolf. This wolf haunted & kept in the den called Lupercal. Se from thence ran to the bank fide under the fig-tree Ruminalis for to the fuckle the faid babes, and to gave the name unto the cave to be called Lapercal, as it were the larking hole and den of the wolf. There be again that would have Evander to give the name to the same hollow cave : for he, as is before declared, was descended from Arcadia, where the people after most ancient rites and ceremonies, do right devoutly worship Pan, the god of herdmen. Vnto whom also a mountain in Arcadia to him dedicated, was called Lycaus, for that he keepeth, Aurisc, i wolves from the fneep, and preferveth the flocks and herds. This Evander therefore coming upon a time into Italy, and resting in these parts, consecrated both this grove and cave to Pan, and according to the manner of his countrey, there honoured him. In the faid cave therefore reared was an altar, and a goat thereupon facrificed unto him, as to the god and preferver of the flocks and feeing that goat thereupon factineed unto min, as to the place wherein he was worshipped took the name*Lu.

Now the feast Lupercalia was by Romulus and Remus instituted. For they having obtained of Numitor a plot of ground to build them a City on, in that very place where they had been c ft forth, called all their companions to a fealt and merry meeting : where, after they had killed factificer, and refreshed themselves with meat, and withall taken their wine liberally to the full, they grew to disport, and in the merry fit clad themselves in the skins of the goats which they had in erificed, and then fell to hopping and dancing full jocundly. Hereupon their posterity, celebrating the memorial thereof, held a feltivall folemoity called Lupercalia, which retained the name of the place where first the hey began. Hereof lee more in Valerius Maximus, Servius & Plutarch in the life of Antonias. As for the fig-tree Kuminalis, it was so named of the river Tyber, called at the Ramon Some would have it take the name of Romulas. This, how loever it be called new, was well known to be molt ancient, and is different from that, which Caracalla repaired under his bains.

The fireet fugarius, otherwise called Thurarius, leadeth from the gate Carmentalis, along the foot of the Capitol hil, to the Forum Romanum. In it was the altar of Jane Juga, who was thought to make marriages, and to couple folk in matrimonies, and she it was that gave the name to VI-

Figures Thusens beginneth at the Forum, and along the foot of the Palatine sheweth the way to Velabram. The reason of the name was this. The Tulcans upon a time fighting against the Aricians, were by them overcome; and after many thousands of them slain in battel, the rest being few in number fied to Rome: who taking delight in the pleasant feat of the City, & the commodiousness of the place, determined there to remain. Whereupon having a plot of four fladingranted them by the Senat, between the Capitol and Palatine, they inhabited the fame, Hetupon the fireet was called by them Thufen: Vient, & many a 100 yeer after retained that name, in it afterwards there kept bawds and fuch kind of people, whereupon it grew out of credit, and loft also the first name.

The old steples (which some think Romalus crefted) continued a long time built of brick, neithe would the Romans fuffer that any man should make them of marble : to the end, that the memorial of their City founder, should remain more firmly in the minds of men. But in continuance of time long after, they decaied and fell down, in that very place where now is the church of Saint Mary of Grace; and were never afterwards recdified. The Romans named that place Senaculam, between the Capitol and the Forum, wherein the Senat kept a conflitory for counfell

The divers exymologies of Palatine,

Lbeit the hill Palatine were along time inhabited before the City was built, and namely. first by Valentia the daughter of Italias; then by Evander, who also therein fet up a castle: whom there succeeded after the City was founded, KK. and Emperors; infomuch as fearcely any one place of Rome is more renowned by writing, then this hile yet the certein reason of the name why it should be so called, and which a man may be bold to follow, can hardly be fet down. Some would have it to called, because the Arcadians wandring with Equander difor derly, and the Palarines out of the Rhearine territory (called like wife Palarium)came to that mount and it inhabited : others of Palasthe great grandfather of Evander. Livy thought, that of Palanteum a City of Arcadia, it was first called Palantium, and afterward Palatine, There are befides, who of Palatia the wife of Latinus, fetch the original of the denomination : or of Palatho. the daughter of Hyperborens, who bare Latinus unto Hercules, and inhabited this mountain ; or of Palantia the daughter of Evander, who there was buried; or of Palas, who was himfelf interred in it. Some there was also, of the blearing of theep, which pattured there in times patt, before the bill was by men frequented and peopled imagine it was to named or elfe because flocks were wont there palare, that is, to wander and grafe up and down. And hereupon it is, that Novins called it Balantium, of Balatus ; or Palantium of * palare, Tremellius calleth it the mount Rumuleus, of Romulus his image, found at the very foot of the faid hill. This may fuffice of the derivation of the name.

When the Romans had performed fortunatly many martiall explores, and oftentimes returned with victorie over their enemies, because they would not be found antisultankfull to the gods, unto whom they were beholden for their happy atchievements, and thereby afterwards miffe of the like formast fuccesse; they confecrated unto the goddesse Victory stempes to that part of the Palatine, which looketh toward the hortyards and gardens of Maria News in the very bottom of the descent, hard at the gate Romana. L. Pofthumiuran Edils doub cook order for the building thereof, out of certain mony raifed by fines and penalties; and when his finished, he dedicated it to the goddetle Victoria.

Neer thereto there was a chappel, confecrated to Vilteria, which M. Porcius Cato vowed.

Befides in the tame place was the temple of Tuno Sofbita.

The Arcadians, which with Evander came to the Palatine hill, built a temple also in Palatines to Victory, but and flerent from this above-named, as far more ancient and to the honor of that, goddefle, jolmn zed veerly facrifices.

They built a temple also to Ceres in the Palatine.

Cornelius caried it from the lea into the Palatine, and beltowed it into the temple of Victory, until such time as one was built of purpose for her. Afterwards. M. Livius and C. Claudius the Cenfors, took order for a temple to be made to this great mother of the gods, & the fame fet out with flatues, pillars and pavement of divers flones of great price. And Junius Bruius dedicated it. The plaies also and games called Megalefia, wheref Civero fpeaketh, were fielt inflittited at the dedication thereof.

In it was erected by the Senat, a statue unto Numerians the Emperor, and a singular oratory. In the same porch, the Romans also set up a statue unto M. Varro, whiles he lived.

Likewise the bay tree, which the same day that Augustus was born, sprung with him and sudda nly appeared, was in Palatium. Of this laurel tree, they that afterwards triumphed, were wont to wear their wreathed garlands,

The Palatine bains whereof Cicero maketh mention in his Oration for Roleins, were in the fame 1. 1 tiem; and of them there remain yet some tokens, above the Circus max, not far from the vineyard of Fedra.

In the fame mountain also there was a place called Sicilia, and Inpiters parlor,

The most beautiful streets called A stoniana, paved with Lacedamonian and Porphyret stones, were in Palatium. The streets also of Padus, and Fortuna respiciens, were to be seen in Palatine, And there were the games and pastimes celebrated, which they call Palatnal.

CHAP. VII.

The Palatium now called the Grester: the court-yard of the Palatium : and the old gue of the very Palatium it felf.

How great a compass the Palatium took up in old time, how gorgeously it was built, how frequent and full of houses, the huge ruins, the pictures, statues, and most pretions pillars there found, do eafily declare. For no man ever hath left in writing, who first built so great and stately edifices; who afterwards enlarged the same, and in so conspicuous a place erected those houses, By little & little it grew to so great an height, as if all writers (Hould be ignorant of those antiquities: neither was any thing at one time done at once, which seemed worth the memorial, For Hilloriographers are wont to deliver unto posterity those things only which are rare and worthy of admiration. The mount Palatine at this day is called Palatium majus, and fetting afide the Church of Saint Andrew, hath scarce two houses inhabited. The rest being either replenished with vines or fit for pasture, yeeldeth grass and food, for sheep, caples, and goars. So as it seemeth it may be called Balantium of the bleating that sheep make, rather than Palantium

This Palatium had also a place therein called Arrium, built in old time and hallowed by August in it the Senat fare in councel, because they might not affemble in any place unaugurate or unhallowed. Therein also rams were sacrificed

The old gate of the Palatium was neer the Rostra, over-gainst S. Laurence Chutch in Miranda, some would have this to be called the gate of Romalus, in old time.

CHAP, VIII. The Temples of Janus, Augustus, and Faustina.

Free the description of the Temples and edifices of Palatium the third part of the city, now A followeth a fourth : namely, the Roman Forum, Therein is the most stately Temple of James, (for me thinks we do well to begin at Ianus, who is counted the dore and entrance as it were of all things) having four gates. For lanus himself, who was therein worshipped, had sour faces; and from Fallci a city in Tufcany forced by the Romans, he was translated to Rome into the Forum, named after Transitorium. His Temple was built in that part of the said Forum which looked toward the Roman Forum. Procopius faith, that inhis daies it was built in the mids of the Forum over-against the Capitol, a little above the place which the Romans called, The three Destinies. Other Temples there were besides of Iams, and namely, in the Capitol neer the theatre of Marcely lus, with two fronts all of brafs, and had two brafen dores, which in time of peace were shut; and against war, were set open.

The temple of Augustus was builded in the Roman Forum. This was begun in the time of Tiberius the Emperor, but left unperfect. Caligula finished it. Above it, he made a bridge which joyned the Capitol and Palatine together.

There remain yet to be seen certain monuments and marks of the temple of Fausting. Hadring mus the Emperor her husband founded it at the foot of the Palatine hill (where the brasen image of a bull (tandeth) for her fake that the might be honoured as a goddets. The fame, his fon Antenius Heliogabalus afterwards would have to be a temple for himlelf, or Inpiter Syrius, or elfe the Sun. At this day it is the church of S. Laurence in Miranda.

CHAP. IX. The Temple of Caftor and Pollux, and the Roffra.

No man doubteth but that the temple of Castor and Pollaz was somtime in the Roman Forum before the Rostra, neer to that abovesaid of Faustina. This sacred house A. Posthumius the Dictator dedicated; and L. Metellus afterwards repaired and beautified it, with the Dalmatian spoils. In it, as in many other, the Senat used to sit in councel, and therein were publick Orations made to the people. C. Metellus adorned the same with statues, pillars, and excellent painting; wherein also he set up the portaiture and resemblance of Flora, a picture of singular beauty, A table befides, which contains the records and monuments, touching the free burgeoffie granted to the horsemen of Capua. The steps and greeces going up to this temple, Clodius afterwards plucked up, as witneffeth Cicero.

There was a temple or confecrate place called Roffra, at the foot of the hill Palatium, overagainst that before-named of Castor and Pollux, whereas now is the little chappel of S. Mary de Infermo. From these Rostra, were the sentences and acts of the Senat, brought and propounded to the people.

The Temple of Calar, Venus Genitrix, and Mars revenger : and the court of Venus.

CASar of famous memory had a temple neer his own Forum, at the broad-fiseet called Sarra, behind the temple of Faustina. In it were set up as Saints, Vittory and Castor.

In the same Casars Forum, there stood a chappel of Venus Genitrix, behind the said temple of Fauting. This, Cafar vowed in the Pharfalian war, and dedicated it. After victory in the war against Pompey, Cafar enclosed the temple of the faid Venni, within a court-yard and a cloister, which Hadrian afterwards repaired and built new.

Augustus Cufar in the battel of Philippi, vowed a temple to Mars the avenger, which afterwards he edified in his own Forum, wherein were certain iron pots dedicated to Mare: and two statues, bearing up the tabernacle of Alexander the Great. This is thought to be at this day the church of Saint Martina, CHAP. XI. The Temples of Vulcan, Concord, Peace, Romnius, and Venus Cloacina.

In the temple of Vilcan there was dedicated unto Vulcan, the brasen chariot of Romulus, wherein he rode in triumph a second time. Therein remained also the statue of Cocles there erected. Many a time were Orations made to the people

In the yard belonging to Vulcans temple, Pulvius, the fou of a Libertine or enfranchifed citizen, 303 years after the building of the capitol, vowed the temple of Concord, if he could reconcile the States of Senstors and Gentlemen to the people. Afterwards he built it of the amercements and penalties that he took of Ulurers condemned, at the foot of the mount Palatine; Opimius the Conful afterwards repaired it anew. In it, Pliny tellifieth that an altar ran blood for two daies.

Livia Dr. filla in her open gallery, erected a chappel of Concord, in regard of the mutual and loving agreement between her husband and her: which afterwards Tiberius dedicated.

In that place where Drufilla first founded the said chappel of Concord, Yespasian afterwards with wooderful celerity and speed, (after the civil wars ended) finished the Temple of Peace, begun before by Claidian. A large building this was and four square, fet our with most stately and rist columns, and of all other Temples the richest. In it Yespasian bettowed the holy vessels and previous ornaments of the Temple in Hierasalum, which T had shewed in triumph. It had also the statue of Gampuedes, and an infinite number of other ornaments wherewith it was decked and beautified. This Temple caught a fire, and at once suddainly was consumed whole 1 and never was it known to this day how this fire came; unless it were (as some imagine) by reason of an earth-quake which happed the same hour, the stones subbed together and struck fire.

An altar of Peace was by Angufus first reared; but in what place, the posterity knoweth nor. The same, Agrippa afterwards enlarged and adorned, Between the Temple of Peace and Faustina, there is at this day a most nation. Temple, and two pillars of the ports to it, which now is dedicated to the two brethren Saint Cosmes and Damians. Some think it was the Temple of Roms-Is and Remus, the same that Carvillus the Confal, after he had subdued the Samnits, dedicated, and of the infinit mass of ipoils adorned it.

That the Temple of Venus Close in affood neer the broad firest Sacras Ovid testifieth. Now the image of this Close in was found in a privy or draught, called Maxima, and Taims conferrated it. And because it was not known whose resemblance it was, it took then ame of the place wherein it was found.

The Temples of Tellus, Salus, Victoria, the Sun and Moon, the house of Cassius, and the Armory.

Where the Temple of Tellus flood, some say it is uncertain; others think it was not sat from the Esquil. a, neer the rising of the hill that leadeth to S. Peters Church in Fincula, where as now standed the Temple of Pantaleen, Sempronius vowed it: for whiles he sought a battail with his enemy, at Assaulant the head Town of the Picentins, the earth guaked: and because he would pacify the goddes Tellus (i, the earth) which he thought was angry, he vowed this Temple unto her. Built it was in the same plot of void ground, where the house of Spurius Cassius (who sought to be a King) was overthrown. Neer unto this Temple of Tellus, there was an Atmoty; where of Cicero also maketh mention in a certain place. Within the said compals, C. Janius Bibaculus the Consul, vowed a chappel to the goddes Sals, in the time of the Samits was. The same was by him put forth to building when he was Censor, and dedicated by him Dictator.

L. V. lumnius an Ædile, canfed the Temple of Vittoria neer the Roman Forum to be made, of the penalties and fines taken.

In this place also was the altar of Apollo.

Some would have, that the Temples of Concord and Esculapius, were neer the Amphitheatre, in the place where the gardens be of S. Mary the new.

The Temple of Morcury also was in the Forum.

The Temples likewife of 1fis and Serapis were in the Burffe called Empirium. And some think, that these were the Chappels of the Sun and Moon, dedicated by Tatius.

CHAP. XIII.

The Forum of Trajanus: the things now therein, or that have been heretofore.

Thus much of Temples, of holy and religious places, which feemed worth the noting, hath been briefly written. Now from hence forward we will feel to find the things, which shall concern the honour and memorial of mortal men, and first begin we will with that excellent Prince Transmus.

Forum Trajani was built (with wonderful Art and industry of man) by Apolloderus, between the Forum of Nerva, the Capitol hill, and the mount Quirinal. The same workman built also (at the command) ent of Trajanus) Metadesus and Gymnashum. The roof of that Forum or Hall was of brais, within round about in every place the forms and images of horses, and militaryensight all guilt. Now were these forefaid images exceed these at the cities charges in memorial of them that had deserved well of the common weal, or otherwise of one notable act.

The triumphant arch in like manner with many other monuments reared to the praise of Trajanus, adorned this Forum or hall of his.

The porch of this Forum, built upon most mighty and high pillars, and resting upon large chapiters, yeelded so great admiration to the beholders, that they seemed rather the works of gyants than men, Into this, Alexander Severus in the honor of Trajanus, translated most beautiful statues of singular men.

Trajans horie in like manner flood in the mids, bearing upon high columns. In a coin also there is found the image of Trajan, with this inscription: S. P. Q.R. Optime Principly The Senar and the people of Rome tathe best Prince. But hereof Lampridius writerfund.

Helikewise is reported to have adorned the palace, made of sundry marbles, with pictures and statues within.

In the midft of the Forum, there flood the column of Trajan, built with winding flairs. This had round about it the fummary of the acts of Trajan engraven and chased most cumingly but above all the Dakes war: within there be 185 steps up to the top; and it hash 40 little windows to let in light unto them that shall go up: 120 foot high it was, or (as Europius writeth) 140. In the louver or lantern thereof were the boites of Trajan kept within a golden ball. This pillat, Trajan himself never saw for while he warted against the Parthians, the Senat dedicated it unto him in his absence. But he in his return from the Persans, died in the way at Sciencia. City in Syria, of a filx of blood, His dead corps was brought to Rome: and of all the Emperors, he alone (as Europius writeth) was interred within the City. The reason why his bones are left in that Column is this: The manner in old time was, for Princes and Noblemen to be buried under hills; but there being not mountains enough whereupon to raise septiments in every place, it happed that such steeples and high pillars were set over their dead bodeic instead thereof.

CHAP. XIV.
The Forum, the Palace, and porch of Nerva.

Next to our fight cometh the Forum of Nerva, and it is behind the Chuich of S. Hadrian. In the midd of it there flood a Column of brafs of an huge bigness; covered with plate of latteri or copper, and hath within it, light every way. This Forum was garnished with divers flatues and Columns, containing the whole order of the achs of Nerva. This was alterwards called Forum Transform it there was the way to the Forum of Augustus. and the Roman.

There appeareth as yet some part of the Porth or gallery belonging to the Forum: for Being consumed by fire-yet it left certain obscure tokens, witnessing, that in the same place was the Forum of Nerva.

Pare also of the Palace of Nerva, built of 4 square stones and pillars, together with the Church of S. Blase, are yet seen enclosed between the Comitium and the tower of Militia.

CHAP. XV.
The Roman Forum the Comitium, the prifon Tullianum, and the Image of Matforius.

The Roman Forum, which also is called Latinum, began at the foot of the Capitoll, and reached in leugth to the Church now of S. Mary the new, which is in Valia. But at the first, the circuit and bounds thereof were much narrower. For from the head thereof abovenamed, it went no fatther than the nearest foot of the mount Palatine. Many a year after, Angustus Cafar enlarged it.

The Comitium joyned to the Forum or rather it was a part thereof : for it beginneth at the gate of Palaium, and endeth at the Church of S. Mary the new.

At the foor of the Capitoll hill, South-eaft-ward, Ancus Martins built a prilon for male factors to be laid up in, After him K. Tulius adjoyned to it that part which is under the ground, and called that dunge on, Tulius, Made it was of huge and mighty big flones, with narrow long holes, for to receive the shadow, as it were, and resemblance of a light. The dunge on within was vaulted with stone, mugly for darkness, and loathlone by reason of a strong and stinking sent. This whole prilon was divised into two parts, the uppersoon and the nether. Carer it was called in Latine a corresponding to the production of the control of the

Just before this prison there lieth a huge mast be-idoll which they call Marforius Some think it was the Image of the bakers god, others, of rapter, furnamed Panarius, of the tumours that bear outlikes to loaves of bread. For the Romans in times past, when they were beforeged by the Gauls in the Capitella, had warning by Jupiter in a dream, to make bread of all the corn that they had left, and to throw it into the enemies camp. Whereby the Gauls despairing that the Romans could possibly be tamed with hunger, bake up the siege. Whereupon the Romans in perpetual memorial of this benefit erested an alar and a statue to Jupiter Pistor.

This image is thought to be the relemblance of the river Rhenus in Germany, because it is upon a Rock. But why it should be called Marforum, know not unless it be because it standeth in the Forum of Augustus:

Directly there followeth the Temple, sometimes of Saturn, now, S. Hadrians Church, The said Temple was of great antiquity. Some report L. Largius for the builder thereof; others L. Tarquinius: albeit more likely it is that Largius dedicated it Livy writeth, that when A. Sempronius and M: Minutius were Coff, Numantius Planew reedified it. The treasury of the people of Rome, no writer denieth, but that it was translated out of the Capitolinto this Temple. But why men in old time would have the treasure to be within Saturns Temple, there be divers opinions, Some fay, because in Saturns daies there was no thest committed: for under him all things were common: no covetous miser nor lewd person laid wait for his neighbour, but all things were administred with righteousness, faith, and love. Cyprian alledgeth this cause, because Saturn was the first that in Italy ordained money to be coined. Moreover, in this treasure-house were kept the publike ordinances. Also the books called Elephantini, containing the five and thirty tribes of the people of Rome Moreover, all the books of the Cities accounts : also the ancient writings and records of the old Erarium and the City debts. Furthermore, the standards and ensigns of war. Over and besides. what foever was by the Generals and Captains after the conquest of Provinces carried in triumph, was thither brought. Laftly, what soever was expedient and profitable for the Common-weal to be referved, as laws, letters, and other common registers of a City. The Centors likewise were put to take their oath in the Temple of Saturn.

Between the Church now of S. Hadrian, and that which sometime was the Temple of Coffer and Pollux, flood in old time the work-house wherein they coined money.

CHAP. VII.

The golden Miliarium the bridge of Caligulathe Roftra and the Curia. Iliarium aureum flood in times past at the head of the Roman Forum, under the Temple of Mariem aureum tood in times pan at the mean it was so called, wherein all the high-waters Saurn, pear to the arch of Septimius. A pillar it was so called, wherein all the high-waters are so that a mariem, have and went on of Italy were cut and engraven, and there ended, and from which the measures began and went on to every gate of all quarters.

Caligula brought a bridg of marble through the Roman Forum from the mount Palatine to the Capitoll. A more stately and curious piece of work there never was throughout all the City : for the bridg was sustained with four core mighty pillars of most white marbie: whereof as this day three are to be seen at the foot of the one hill, and as many at the other, in such manner as they were in times past by Caligula built for the bridg. In the midst of the Forum, over-against S. Hadrians Church there standeth a pillar, which is verily thought to be one of them that supported the brazen horse of Domitian gilded all over. At the foot of this horse was the resemblance of Rhene, a river in Germany; for that Domitian the Emperor had triumphed over that Province. And this is the Image which afterwards they called Marforius.

Of the beakheads of the Antiat ships, a pulpit was built in the Roman Forum by the Romans at the foot of the mount Palatine, which Temple they called Roftra, that therein the acts of the Senat should be made. Now of this Rostrathere were twain, the new at the bottom of the Palatine as is before said, and the old, near the Curia in the Comitium. In this Rostra were laws published, causes pleaded, and Orations made to the people. On the same the manner was also to erect the Statues for most famous and noble men.

In the most conspicuous place of the Forum Romanum, before Rostra, upon a lion of stone was the portraiture let for Faustulus the fosterfather of Romains and Remus. For he, whiles he was delirous to part the fray between Romalus & Remus the founders of the City, was there flain, where. afterwards they erected unto him his flatue. Behind the Roftra was the epulchreal fo of Romalus. Moreover, before the Roftra flood the flatue of Hercules, clad in a coat after the Eleans habit, with a grim and flern countenance. Three flatues also of Sibylla in the fame place. The manner of the Romans besides, was to fet up the heads of those that were putto death, there to be feen.

Two (write or Councill-houses at Rome there were : one near the Forum; fast by the Temple of Peace named Hoffilia; the other in the mount Calius, whereof we will speak hereafter.

> CHAP. XVIII. The L. ke Curtius, the great fink or town ditch, and the Doliola.

He lake Curtius was in the midft of the Rom. Forum, near Domition his horfe. This lake took that name of M. Curtius, who to fave the Common-weal, willingly of his own according himself headlong, armed as he was, together with his horse into a chink of the ground in the midst of the Roman Forum. Some would have it so called of Metius a Sabine, who through this lake elcaped fafe to his own company, ""

The vault or finkcalled Cloaca Maxima, was made by the commandment of Tarquin: for by reason that the hils were digged under and the first flood hollow upon arches, it received & carried away all the fifth thereof. At the Temple of Jap. Stator, divided it was later third convey ances or channels, whereof two of them are now stopped up, the third numeth with most clear water by the Lake Curtius, under the Roman Forum, along the foot of the mount Palatine like Velabrum, and from thence in a link made offour-fquare flone, it dischargeth it selfanto Tyber an old time there were many such vaults, and those for publike nie; But after the City was wen by the Ganls there were many must wants and the rorebuild his hoffle, where he could meet first with a convenient place; they took no heed to the fireets as they were before : fo as neither the City was divided as aforetime into quarters, nor yet the finks which in times past went under the streets, were marked where they lay: but afterwards were conveyed under privat mens houles, whereby it came to pass, that each house almost at this day hath a fink or privy belonging to it. Hereupon also it is, that this author, who seepitome or a bridgment we write, hath not divided the regions of the City, agreeable to the old writers. But to the end that those things which he setteth down, might be Goner underflood, and better remembred, he hath parted it into those quarters as now it flandeth and when he sheweth in what part of the city any place in times past was; he declareth them in those coasts which at this day are known to the Inhabitants. But as at first these sinks were common (as I have said) so there were appointed publike overseers to look unto them,

Near the forelaidgreat fink there was a place, which of certain barrels under the ground was called Doliola, This place was reputed to holy, that a man might not foit thereupon. In it were supposed to have been certain secret mysteries of Numa, And yet, there be that think verily the ashes of the French Senones were there bestowed.

The Comitium, the Temple of Venus Genitrix. The Statues and Images that were in the Comitium and Roman Forum Cafars statue and pillar.

7 Here the Comitium was, from what place it began, and in what part of the City it ended-We have shewed before, in the sifteenth chapter of this book. Called it was Comitium. as Plut arch faith, for that Romulus and Taiss were wont to meet together in this place, to make covenants between them. In which place afterwards, the Senst and people of Rome affembled, when they would decree any thingfor the good of the C.W. and namely, when Confuls, Tribunes Confular, and fuch Magistrats were created, and other affairs concluded, whereof authors make mention in all their writings. That place was near the Senaculum, at the very foot of the mount Palatme, This Commissm was open above-head for many years: whereupon oftentimes, albeit affemblies were summoned, yet they were empeached holding for them, searing some tempessuous weather toward. Long time after, when Annibal came into Italy, they fet a roof over it: and afterwards Cafar repaired it again, In this Comitium the places were many times exhibited. In the fame (as Livy reporteth) the books of Sibylla were burm. In like manner many lewd and outragious acts were committed in the affemblies there, whereof elsewhere we will speak.

In the Comitium flood the statue of cocles; which being afterwards strucken with fire from heaven, was translated into the court-yard of Vulcan. In the cantons and angles of the Comitium, were the statues likewise of Pythagoras and Alcibiades: Also in the ascent and stairs thereof, on the left hand of the Caria flood the Image of Accisa, together with his whetflone and razor.

The image refembling the Mother goddels, was fet up in the Forum. They that worthipped this goddets were of this opinion, that the flone whereo: the was made, could not possibly be confumed with fire: which they gueffed hereby for that albeit many fires were made, in the night efpecially at her Image, yet it took no hurt thereby; and therefore gave they out, that there was such vertue herein, as I have faid. And from thence it came, that in all fireets almost they began to worship her and to erect alters and little chappels unto her.

The Temple of Venus Genitrix, as is shewed before, was in the Forum: Just before this Temple flood the statue of Cafar, carrying a blazing star upon the head. In like maner a Column of Cafor made of Numidian marble 20 foot high there remained. Before the Temple of caffor there was the statue of Q. Martim in horseman's habit ; of Tremellius clad in a sidegown; of M. Atti-Cafars Forum : the Palace of Paulus, and his Library.

Desides the Temple of Saurm, or the common treasury (whereof we have written before in the Te chap, of this book) in the Roman Forum toward the Northeast was Casars Forum, even in that very place which seemeth lower than the rest, behind the Temple of Faustina. There, was the Temple of Venus Genitrix, about which, Casar made a clositer and a Forum, not of waters and merchandise to be fold, but for them that repaired thither for justice in law matters. In this Forum, among other statuses (whereof there were many and those most fair and beautiful) he instead his own to be made, all armed. The Forum it self contained but a small compass, but it was most excellently set out. The very level of the plot stood him in an hundred millions of Asses and above.

Cafar purchased with 1500 talents, Paulus Emylius the Collegue of C. Marcellus in his Consalships, to be his friend and to stand with him, Paulus having received this sum of money-built in the midst of the Forum wear to the Temple of Castor and Pollux, a most excellent and wonderfull Palace, of Phrygian columns, which afterwards they named, Bashlei Paulus.

A Library also the same Paulus erected near unto his own Basilies.

CHAP. XXII.

The Forum of Augustus: the galleries of Antonius, Faustina, and Livia: Casars house,

The Roman Forum; those also of [Julius] refar and Angustus, were (as it is well known) near one to another. That of Angustus, they affirm to have been at the image of Marsonius, in the most frequented place of the City: it was but in little compass, as the other of Casarsonius, in the lently well adorned with brave statues and other things. For it had the statues of Casarsonius with the victory of Alexander the Great: the image also of Corvinus, and of the raven that upon his helmet sought. Also Apollo in Ivory; and besides these, other ensigns and ornaments of vertue and valour.

In this Hall or Forum, publike justice was administred: and the judges from thence were empanelled: herein they debated in councill, of wars, of triumphs, and other weighty affairs. From hence they used to go when they took journey into their Provinces with soveraign command, Hither, they that returned victors, brought the ensigns and tokens of their victory. This Forum being by time decaied, Hadrian reedified.

This Forum had two porches, wherein were the statues set out & decked in triumphant manner, Angusus when in the street Sacra, in a house not so large and stately, but marvellously similated by his nececLivina, And Angustus not able to abide this wasself us uperfluity of riches, pulled it down and laid it even with the ground: in the void plos and court-yard whereof, was atterwards built the gallery of Livia; which also was called Claudia. Nero cast it down, but Domitian built it up again under the old name.

The goodly galleries of Antonine & Fauftina, adorned with divers and fundry marbles wel built in old time, were whereas at this day standeth the Church of S. Laurence in Miranda.

CHAP XXIII.

The rafter or beam, called Sororium Tigillum : the street Cyprius, Sceleratus, and Patritius: the house of M. Antonius.

Sororium Tigillum was a place hallowed for the explation and affoiling of Heratius for killing this fifter fet up near the freet Carina, to the honour of Jupiter.

The fireter Cyprius is near to the cliff or rifing of the Capitol), which leadesh to the Church of S. Peter in Vineulia. So called of Cyprus. In it dwelt the Sabins first, when they were assauchised and made free denizons, Surnamed afterwards it was Seeleratus, upon the wicked and devillish aft of Tulia, whereof Lizy speaketh, Some think this was one with the former: others say, it was divers from it.

The street Patritius was so called, because of Patritis, who were by K. Tulius commanded there to dwel. For this was a place raised somewhat higher than others; from whence as from the upper grounds they might easily defend themselves against the sudden violence of others, if it should be offered.

M' Antonius dwelt in that house, where sometimes stood the Temple of Tellus. Aster Antonius, the Church of S. Pantalion was in the same place built.

As for Aguinelium, it was so called, because the house of Melius who sought to be K. was there laid level with the ground,

CHAP. XXV.
The firees called Via Sacta: the arch Fabian and Vefpafian.

This firect beginneth at the old Curia, in the angle of Palatium near the arch of [Great] Cona famina. Visro supposed that it began at the Caria, and the chappel of Sternia. Whereby a man may gather that the Via facra sometimes went through the gardens now of S. Mary the new, to the Temple of Peace, the Porum of Calor, and so directly up to the Caftle of the Capitol. The name of Sacra it took for that the August when they came from the Capitol hill, went through it as they took their Augustroe because monthly, they went in proceeding with facred residues along that way: or last of all, in regard that in it there was a league and covenant made between Romalum and Tatius. At the head and top of it, Anous Martius in times past dwelt, near the chappel of the Lares.

The arch Fabian likewife, near the Kings Palace, fast by the Basiliea of Faulm, was reared by Fabian the Cerico, who subdued the Albbroges. In which arch was the scurcheon with his arms, and other reskens of the victory engraven. Fast by it, Scribonim Libo erected a leat and Tribunal for the Prator named Patent.

In the lamettreer way was the marble arch of Vefpafian, (the ancientest of all others that are now to be seen) erected by Vefpafian after he had won Hierafalem. In it were his victories cut and engraven, with theark of the covenant of one side, and on the the other, his triumphs and poils; and namely, the golden candlestick; the seven other lights, the two tables of Moses, the vei-fels of the Temple of Hierafalem; the golden table, weighing one great talent; and many things else, where of Jesphus writtesh.

CHAP. XXVI.

Gracostasis; Senaculum; the Guria; the Palaces of Opimius and Porcius.

Reofinite is a place on the right hand of the Roftra, as mengo forth of the Comitium; where, the Emballadors of fortain autions being fent unto the Senat, used to stand and give attendance until they were admitted to audience.

The Palace of Opinius, and the Caria, flood near unto the Gracoftafis. Above the Gracoftafis was the Senaculam at the Temple of Concord; Called it was Sanaculum, because the Senat or the elders were wont shere to meet, in Greek it is named regula.

Coria was in the Comitium, and fone think it is all one with Senaculum; fo called, because the affairs that required publike care were there debated. There was a Coria also of Priests, where Churche matters were handled and treated of Now this Coria where the Senat met, was a Temple or hallowed place: for neither might the Senat meet, mor act of Senat pais, but in the place set ant and appointed by augusty. Hereupon Caria Hostilias Pompeia, and Jalia, being profane places before, were by inauguration confectanced Temples, in this Coria was the altar of Victory: and upon the stairs of the said Caria stood the image of Victory, and do fine pure gold.

Cato the elder in the time of his Ceniorship, built (with the City money) a palace near to the Forume, mader the Carria, which after his own name he called Portia Basilica.

The palace also of Romatum (as ment think) flood where the Church is now of S. M. ary the new. These places therefore which have been thus described in the sourch region of the City, joyned cognitive more place in a flamer, and were all contained within this circuit, as you go from the Commitme covered the Temple of Peder, and the Church and gardens of S. M. ary the new almost as the Esquilia.

The Temple of Janus and Piety: of the publike goal of Rom. Commons.

Fixing that four parts of the City are described, the fifth ensiteth; which included those places that comprehend Tybre, part of the Aventine on the right hand, and the rock Tybre, part of the Aventine on the right hand, and the rock Tybre, part of the Aventine on the right hand, and the rock Tybre with as the meators ble places, which rise text after the Theatre of Marcellan, and so run through the plain and levell plot of the City, And with Janus first, whom men in old time believed to be the very door, and as it were the entrance of all things. Unto Janus Numa built a Temple at the gate Carmentalis, (afterwards the chappell of S, Katharine) at the bottom of the Argierin, alone close unto the theatre of Marcellus. This Temple had two doors: intime of peace they were flut; but in war opened by that Conful, who, as the worthier person, was first created. It is sound in records, that this Temple was thut but only thrice, First, by Numa himself: secondly, by T. Mantisse the Cost, and a third time by Angustius, after the battel of Astissm. But why in time of war is stoogher than the state of the warred against the Sabins: for when the Sabins were now possessed of the gate Carments is a warred against the Sabins: for when the Sabins were now possessed for the gate Carments as plenteous river and stream of hot scalding water out of the Temple of January, which stood near to the gate: whereupon they were driven to stee, and so the City was saved. From hence it is that possesses where you help in time of war.

Others report that Taim and Romalus both were that ounders of that Temple: as who, when the covenant was made betwist them, agreed together of that two-faced god as an indifferent and common witness to them both of the accord contracted between two Kings and two nations: and so erected unto him this Temple in that very place where now the ruins of S. Katharines Church are to be seen.

Moreover there be who aftirm, that Cn. Duilim vowed it, and Tiberim built it: but the variety of these opinions seemeth hereupon to arise is for that it is received and held for certain, that there were many Juni worshipped as gods by the posterity; whereas they in old time believed but one fo as that which is ipoken of divers, is fallly supposed, as faid of one. Which may be seen before, whereas we wrote of Junus with sour fronts or faces, whose Temple was erected in the Forum, For it is said, that Junus was the first who erected Temples and ordained divine service and ceremonies for the gods; and therefore in facrifices deserved the first place.

Pourtraied he is with a key and a wand; as who is the porter to keep the gates, and the guide to direct the waies.

Augustus besides, brought his image out of Ægypt to Rome, and in the herb-market built a Temple in the honour of him.

To Pietr in the said herb-market, M. Atilius Glabrio dedicated a Temple in that very place where at this day standeth the Church of S. Nicholas in the prilon: for even there Ap. Claudius the Decemvir by a decree of the Senat built a prison, for that the commongoal (whereof we have written before) was not sufficient; and called it, The prison for the Commons of Rome: wherein himself afterwards being found guilty wrought his own death. In which also many years after, a certain filly poor woman of base and obscure parentage being newly brought a bed being apprehended for an heinous offence, was condemned to bestarved to death. Her daughter, being a milch woman and delivered lately of a child, made humble request to the goaler, that the might have leave to go to her mother: and when he had made ftreight fearch before, whether fhe brought with her any food; and faw her have nothing about her, let her in: and fo she went and came many times. At the last, known it was that the priloner within was nourished by the breastmilk of her daughter: whereupon the mother was delivered, and let free; and both mother and daughter were allowed their food ever after by vertue of a decree, at the Cities charges and in regard of that kindnels and affection of the child to the mothersthey confecrated this place to the goddels Pieras. Livy supposeth, that it was not the mother but the father that in this manner was by the daughter nourished.

CHAP. II.

The herb-market : the Temple of Juno Matuta, and of Hope: the Oratory or Chappel of Numa: the Column called Lactatia: the Altar and Chappell of Catmenta.

This place hath the name of Forum Holisorium, for that therein is great flore of worts and porherbs without the gate Carmentalia, where, where, in times past was the old market kept: and atthis day called it is the fireet Montanaria.

Within the compals or the faid market-place, C. Cornelius the Conful, in the time of the Gauls war, vowed a Temple to Juno Matura: which afterward being Cenfor, he put out to building, in that very place whereafterwards flood the Church of S. Andrew furnamed in Memura.

The fame C. Cornelius built in the Forum Holisorium the Temple of Hope and the same adorned with divers and fundry marbles: which afterwards Collatinus Confectated M any a day after, it was fmitten with lightning; and in the end fet on fire and burnt.

A Column alio there was in the same market-place, named Lattaria: unto which the sucking babes that were to be nourished with milk, were presented.

The Oratory of Numaflood in the bottom of Argilesum, near the theater of Marcellus.

The Atar Carmentalis, confectated by Evander to his mother Carmenta, flood before the gate Carmentalis,

In the same place also was the Chappell of Carments built by the matrons of Rome. At the first, she was called Nicostrata: but for that she delivered Oracles in verse, the took the name of Carments.

The fish-market, and Temple of Fortuna Virilis.

The fish-market standeth along the Tybre, near to the [Forum] Junium, between the Churches of S. Mary in Particuland Agyptiaca, within the gate Carmentalis, not far from the Forum Boarium; i.e. the ox market.

The Church of S, Mary & Egyptiaca is at this day near the Tybre, and a bridg of the faid name. Some go about to affirm and prove that this was iometime the Temple of More; others, of Fortuna and Chaftir; but all in vain: for those Temples were not in this place, but in the ox-markets as for this Temple of Fortuna Virilis, whereof we now speak it was near Tybre. In it stood the statue of Serv. Tulliss made of wood and guist all over, which in a great scare-fire when all things else were burnt, remained only safe and sound.

CHAP. IIII.
The Temple of Vesta, the Salinx, and the arch of Cocles.

Far the Church of Mary furnamed Egyptiaca, there remaineth at this day a most ancient. Temple, now dedicated to S. Stephen, the frame whereof is circular, and the pillars are fer round about and bear upthe roofs which being one entire piece of work, carrieth the whole Temple. Confectated it was in old times to Vesta: and Numataking that circular platform, from the Temple which was at Alba, made it with a lover in the top, having a hole to give light, Howbeit, of this goddels her felf there is no image nor refemblance; for that fire, whereof she is the goddels, can have no certain and permanent form. As for Vesta, the Latines call her so, because the is a traited with divers and fundry things. Of the Greeks she is named is sa, for that her sorce and power appertainest to altars and herths where fire is kept. This is not the Temple wherein the sacred fire is preserved: but that whereof we spake before, which Romalus built between the Capitoll and Palatium.

Saline were the flore-houses of the salt which served the City; and they flood upon that bankside of Tybre, which from the foresaid Temple of Pela reachest into the Avenine.

The arch of Horaius Cauletthood as the version of the archest into the Avenine.

The arch of Horatius Cocles flood at the very foot of the Aventine hill, where the rifing thereof beginneth between the mount and the Tybre.

CHAP. V.

Haltherto from the beginning of this fourth book, are described those things which on the runthrough all the memorable things which are on the left side of that river: and first, as concerning the beatt-market,

The beaft-market was near to Velabrum and Janus, between the mount Palatine and the Greek fchool, close to the Temple, now called S. Gregories Church. In it there was a most ancient image in brais of a bull, whereupon some think it took the name Boarium. Others, for that oxen were there sold: or because they used in oldcime to facrifice those kind of beatts there: or else, for that Evander, in that place killed an oxe in facrifice to Harenber; for killing Causs and recovering again his kine and oxen. In the same place were kept the instruments wherewith the Ministers belonging to facrifices, the facrificers also themselves, were furnished when they went about their facrifice, In this market-place was the first fight exhibited of twoid-sencers.

The Temple of Hercules Victor, and the Altar called Maxima.

The round Temple of Jupiter Villor was built in the beaft-market, near the Greek school is where sometime Evander reared unto Herenses the altar called Maxima. This Temple (as they say) wassioneligious and venerable, that neither slie is or dog would enter into it. For Herenses at what sime as he distributed a dole of sies he his followers and ministerist in his facrifice, praised unto Majagims: (the god that gathereth slies.) He it is therefore that driveth away all slies from this Temple: and at the door thereof he left his slinb behind, which as soon as the dogs see they un away far off: and thus unto the daies wherein Pling lived it was free from slies and dogs. At the sacrifice and diving strike of this Herenses, neither women nor bondslaves, nor yet freed which Nero the Emperour made.

Over and besides, Evander erected unto Hercules a statue, which was called, Hercules Triumphant, because so often as there was any triumph in the Ciry it was clad with a mantle, and other habiliments of triumph.

All the time that Evandor raigned Herenies had no more but an altar which they called Maxime : and this Evander reated unto him for killing of Cacus, and reftoring his kine and oven again, Upon this altar he facrificed the tenth part of the fruit of his kine : for Hereules had given out and promifed, That they should live an happy life who dedicated unto him the tenth part of their goods, Hereupon cometh the name of Decima Herculanz, i.e. Hercules Tithes.

CHAP. VII.

The Temples of Chaffity, Prosperous Fortune, Matuta, and Fore fortuna : of the place called Vieus Publicus, Velabrum: and the femilebre also of Acca Laurentia.

TEar to the Temple of Hercules, well known it is that a chappell was built by Amylin to Prodicinia Parvita, i.e., Genclewomens chastity, Now the image that represented this Saint, stood in the beaft-market. To the service and facrifices celebrated unto this goddes, virgins that were Commoners daughters might not come. Andtherfore a certain maiden of commoners degree teared a chappell allo to Pudicitia Plebeia. From the fervice and facrifices thereof, the Patrician viegins were likewise debarred, Many other places & Temples besides were consecrated to Pudicitia

The Temples of Profperous Fortune and of Mutata, Servius Tullius confectated in the beaftsmarket : And that Fortune he called Profers, which was not blind. In that place (fay they) an Olive tree sometimes flood, and upon a time when honey dropped and flowed from it, the Soothsavers gave order, that a little coffer or box should be made of the wood thereof wherin those lots were put and laid up, which by the direction of Fortune were either handled or shuffled together by the hands of young boys : as if fuch should prove happy, fortunat, & excellent, & errors Tulling afcribed all his acts what foever to Fortune, who being born of a bond woman, had many times found good by her and was in the end advanced to princely dignity. And hereupon he dedicated Temples to Fortung Primigenia, Mafeula, Convercens, Bene fperans, and Videns, as who would fay the ruled and did all Likewise. Temple be consecrated to little Fortune, signifying thereby, that nothing can happen unto us be it never to small but we must attribute it as coming from the gods.

A Temple to Matuta Camillus vowed in the Veientian war and dedicated it; which long before that time Servins Tullius had erected. To Manta and Fortuna Primigenia the Romans did facrifice upon one and the felf-fame day : and likewife in one and the fame day both their chappels were hurned and confumed with fire together. Carollin the Conful canfod a Temple to be made unto Fors Foreuna, orl Foreis Fareuna pess unto that of Marsea, of the money railed out of the hoil cotten from the Tulcans.

The freet called Vicus Publicus began at the Forum Bearium, and went from theree into the Aventinesas far as to the Temple of June. In this fireet near the faid Forum was the Chappell of Velabrum, in that very place where now standard she Church of Saint Gregory in Velabrum, fo

Aventine hill was sometime separated from the other mountains by the Tyber between : for before that Tarquinius Priscus turned the chanell of Tyber, it brake out many times, and having found a frith or creek, it beat upon the foot of the Aventine. And therefore of necessity, who foever would go to the Aventine was to make a fare, that is to fay, by paying his quadrant, ferry over thither in a Wherry, Hereupon that place is at this day called Velabrum, a vehendo, i.e. lettying ower, where sometimes the Tyber had wrought out a frith.

His Temple & image they erected in the Tukan Breet, near to the alrass of Ops and Cores. The festivall daies of this god, celebrated in the month of October, are called Vertumnalia. Some there be that would have Versummer and Janus with four faces to be all one; upon this reason, for that they affirm the Temple of Janus aforelaid to be in Velabrum, whereas they built that of Vertaminus. But now that Temple whereof we have before spoken, upon four pillars beareth up one roof, and hath four gates befides, and in each forefront twelve little windows, which fignific the four quarters of the year, and the twelve months. In old time they put Janus before, in all facrifices, and gave him that name ah sundo, i.e. going, and hereupon the entries and doors of houses becalled Janua.

Near the image of Vertumnus Pub. Africanus had an house, which Semprenius afterwards bought together with the wooll-shops, and built the palace which they call Sempronin, near the Temple of S. Gregory in Velabrum

But the friends and company about Evander discovered his trains, and so he was by them flain Unto him therefore Evasder reared a tomb even there, and confecrated the place

Now Imm Argiferm is just by the Theatre of Marcellus. In this street were divers shops of artifans or artificers, and especially of stationers or booksellers, and those they commonly called the Argiletan shops.

Cornelius Domitianus is faid to have dwelt in Velabrum.

Equimelium is between Velabrum and the Capitol, near to the staplets and wooll-shops. The name arole hereupon, for that St. Melius, a Roman Citizen who aspired to be K. sometime there dwelt: who being detected of that crime, was killed, his goods conficat and his house laid levell with the ground, and the plot where it flood by the Romans was made a void-yard.

The Temple of Murtia, goddess of Idleness, was under the Aventine upon the ascent of the hill called Clivus Publicus, inthat part whereas folk go up to the Church of S. Prifca. Hereupon the mount Aventine was sometimes called Murtius.

Moreover, some there be that in this place would have the African to stand: but we have shewed before that Afylum was first built by Rom, upon the Capitol. But in process of time, after that to great riches and wealth was gathered and laid up there in the Capitoll, and that otherwhiles the Senat used there to meet and fit in councils the Rom, thought it not with the safest for them that thieves, fellons, and other lewd infamous perions of all forts, should come for refuge thither, and there abide: and therefore they supposed it better for their security to translate this priviledged fanctuary to some othre place. Whereupon not there alone, but in many other parts afterwards there began fanctuaries to be fet up not at Rome only, but also in other quarters of the world

Circus what it is why it was so called and for what can so ordained.

The place where games & exercises of disport were performed, was called the Cirque: so named, for that the scaffolds were built in circuit round about to behold the pattimes; and within that compais the faid folemnities were exhibited: also for that the pomp was carried in shew, and the horses ran about the goals there. Built it was round, but longwise like an arch or bow, having in the circuit about it steps one above another, with apt seats for the beholders, that one should not hinder the prospect of another: in the midst were two marks or goals distant alike one from the other. Also the barriers or exceret; so called, because the horses stood there pent and kept in untill the Magistrate gave the signall to begin the course.

Now these solemnities of games and plaies are festivals in the honour of their gods: for ordained they were first, and still are observed and kept, either for their birth-daies & nativities, or dedications of Temples. And at the very first verily were hunting and baiting of beasts, which they called (Munera) to the honour of Saturn, But the stage-plaies were due to Liber: the Circensian games to Neptane and Ceres. Thus these pastimes were assigned, some to these gods, and others to those; and in honour and memoriall of them yearly folemnized. As for the games Circentes, they were fo called, because when they were to be performed, they had the bank of the river of one fide, and fwords fet to flank the other. But of thefe games, plaies, and folemn fights, Sifinius hath written

Arquinus Priseus instituted first this large circuit for running of races, and laid the foundati-I on thereof between the two mounts Aventine and Palatine, But Cafar was he that enlarged it, and made it more magnificent and stately. For being (as it was) three surlongs and an half in length, and four acres broad; it is thought that it was Cafar and not Tarquin, who fet it out to that largeness; and this soundeth like to a truth, confidering that in Tarquins daies the City was not so populous, neither given so much to these shews and sights, as in the time of Cofar, and therefore the place required not fo great a compais of ground. Now this Cirque for three parts thereof, to wit, the two fides and one of the ends, had a ditch digged ten foot deep, and as many broad: behind that direh were galleries built three flories high; and these had seats made beneath with stone, and above of timber: all which galeries had one and the same bases for they closed together round like a globe. Ablethey were to receive a hundred and fifty thousand men, See more hereof in Diony fins, Pliny, Livy, and others who have written of the Roman Edifices, This Cirque Augustus adorned and beautified afterwards: for he made the barriers of marble, and guilded the goals, and many other ornaments he fet it out withall. Lafly, when it was decaied and falo down, Trajan reedified it, made it more ample, and trimmed it up. Yea, and after him, Heliogabalus fer thereto befides most fair and goodly Columns, and garnished them with gold, and paved the very floor with Chrylocolla. But as touching the beauty of this Cirque, Navarius writerh much. For, by report, fo elegant it was, that men reforted to it, nor, so much to behold the exercises and masteries there, as the pleasant and delectable beauty, of the place. Maximus therefore it was called, either because consecrated it was to Vort immus, the greatest of the gods, or for the excellency and sumptuousness of the games : or else because in comparison of other Cirques, to wit, Flaminian, and the other called Intimus, i.e. the immost this was the biggeft. For Pliny hath left in writing, that it lay out in length three furlongs, and one in breadth fo as it would well ferve for two hundred and fixty thousand men to fit within it.

CHAP. XII.

The Temples and Altars which we read to have been in the Circus Maximus, or about it.

Onfus is reported to be the god of Counfell, either for that he concealeth mens counfels, or openeth them unto men. This God had an altar in the great shew-place covered overwhich betokeneth, that counsell ought to be close and covert. For which cause, this altar as we read, was by the old Romans to him confecrated. For they, at what time as they consulted about the ravithing of the Sabinemaidens, fearing left they should have been detected before the time dedicated this altarto this god, and erected the portraiture and image of him thereon. Which altar verily either by some injury of the times, or through mens neglect of the gods, continued to forlet as it the end it was altogether unknown where it Hood. At length found it was again, and at all other times remained covered, but in the time of horse-runnings, and then it was uncovered and fet open. To this god was the feast also instituted, called Consular. And those disports and pastimes which they devised for the ravishment of the Sabin Virgins, were celebrated at this altar by certain Prietts belonging to that god.

In like manner Neptune, fornamed the Chevalier, had a Temple in this Creas Max, which in the vear of our Lord 1526 was found behind the Temple of S. Anaftafia, at the foot of the mount Pa-Latine, in the very foundations of the Circus: for fuch marks and tokens were there to be feen. that by good evidences it appeared that this was the very Temple of Neptune. For the honour of this Neptane, the games Circenfes were by men in old time folempized.

Alse to Genius the guide and director of secret plots, they directed an altar in the great Cirque Over and besides these, this Cirque contained three other altars: one to the Great gods; a second to the Penats; and a third to those gods of heaven and earth, from whom all things arise and have their beginning. Thele gods above faid, the Romans called Genii, Penates, Prefidents, and keepers of the City.

Liber, Libera, Ceres, and Proserpina, had their Temples about this place called Circus Max. which Posthumius when he warred against the Latines, vowed: and the same man upon his return with happy victory built and dedicated them accordingly.

To conclude, in the same compass were the Temples of the sun, and of Flora.

Moreover, a Temple there flood near this Circus, unto Venus: which Q. Fabius Gurges the Col. caused to bemade of the money raised upon the fines of certain wives that were condemned for playing falle with their husbands.

Lucinus dedicated a Temple to Juventus without the great cirque, not far from that place, . In like fort, Mercury had a Temple near this Circus Max.

In Plinies daies there was feen in the Cirque Max, the image of Fortuna Seia, CHAP, XIII. The Naumachy of the great Cirq ne.

Namachy is a place so called on auton rais rais navon uaxtonro, e. for that in it they used to skitmish with ships. For there were places digged deep like ponds, where were represented some shews of navall fight, for the exercise of the Roman youth, that they might know how to charge and annoy the enemy at sea also. And these kind of sports were exhibited and practised not in the circues only, but also in the Amphitheatres, CHAP, XIV. The two Obelisks of the Cirque Max.

THe Obelisk (as Marcellinus testifieth) was a very huge and rough stone rising like a spire or broch, by little and little to a mighty height: and that it might refemble a ray or fun-beamit groweth smaller and smaller in fashion of a steeple, with four sides or edges, and in the top it is very narrow, and there made plain and smooth right artificially. In most of them are engraven and cut certain Hieroglyphick notes, and namely, such as testifie either the sounder thereof, or else other memorable matters. Of these figures and characters, the same Marcellinus speaketh in this wise:Moreover, the infinite variety of forms and characters, called Hieroglyphicks which all about we see engraven, the ancient authority of the first learning did set forth and mark so. Thus much faith he Now they drew and portraied therein fundry forms and shapes of living beasts and birds, and oftentimes devised new and strange resemblances, whereby they reserved and kept for their posterity whatsoever was memorable and worth remembrance. This manner continued not in Rey pr only, but also in other parts of the world, untill such time as letters were found : and then this was given over. At the first one letter implied a whole word, and one word went for a whole sent ence, But hereof ye shal find much in authors that have written of these characters, Moreover, as Pliny witneffeth, these Obelisks were made of the Rone Simithes. Them they erected and confecrated to the gods, and principally to the Sun: and therefore in hewing and cutting them, they resembled the sun-beams, as we faid before. The first that ever devised these Obelisks, was K, Methres. At Rome were none of these Obelisks wrought and cut out, but brought thither from orher parts, and to for beautifull shew and to wonder at were erected. Therefore in the Cirque aforefaid, called Maximus, two Obelisks were feen, one flanding upright aloft, 80 foot high : the other lying along in the Naumachi; it carried in length a hundred and thirty foot and 8 inches, befides the bale or footstall, which Augustus translated to Rome out of Hicropolusa City of E. gyp: but when he would have fet it upon end it fell down and brake in twain. This was hewn out of the quarry, by King Samnefretens, in whose raign Pythagoras was in Agypt.

CHAP. XV. The arch of Settinius in the Cirque, The place of the Tuberoes in the Cirque. The stems, the house of Pompey, and the fountain of Juturna, Extinius having made conpuest of Spain, brought great store of money into the City chamber: Sand of the spoils taken from enemies he reared two arches; the one in the beast-market, called Forum boarium; the other in the great shew-place, named Circus Maximus, Upon these arches he fet golden images, and other ornaments to beautifie them.

The house and family of the Helii was none of the wealthiest, but yet of great credit and estiestimation with the Romans, Among whom there was so great concord & unity, that 16 of them at one time dwelt and agreed well together in one and the same house. For their (ngular prowess and worthy acts they were allowed by the Senat and people of Rome a Scattold by themselves in all the shew-places and Theatres, to behold all sights and masteries of activity.

About the Circus Maximus flood the flews and brothell houses, where sometimes harlots and naughty-packs kept, such as made profession of whordom, But this place was afterwards laid even with the ground, and is now a void place.

The house of Pomprius was near the Circus Max, & therein was the statue of Hercules erected, The fountain or well of the nymph Juurna, is yet (as some think) to be seen, boiling up in the Velabrum near the common finck or vault called Maxima.

CHAP XVI The Septizonium of Severus.

Here should follow by course after the great Cirque, the fixt part of the City, namely, the mount Calius, But because we meet with the Septizonium of Severus, & the arch of Conffantine (before we come to Calini) between it and the mount Palatine fomething would first be spoken of them, especially being to essellent building as they are. The Septizonium therefore is a mighty mount or terrace railed from the plainground 4 fquares, compatited about with teven articles, that is to lay couries of rows of pillars one above another, yielding as it were as many porches or galleries: and in this order they are disposed, that the higher the pillars stand, the lesser and shorter they be. In the midft bereof four wals atife, containing within them certain hollow places like cabinets. In the top thereof were bestowed and laid the ashes of Kings and Emperors deceased. Jul, Capitolinus nameth this mount Septodium, for the Greeks call plates much frequented, whereunto many waters lead, Heptodia of interio, eleven, and in @: i.e. a way . Pliny calleth it Septifolium, of feven lottes, or foliars. For in every conflethereof the columns meet together in the head with marbles transomes. Other beams there be are besides, reaching inward from them to the mount it self, fo as every fuch course yielded a stage like a gallery or walking place. Two of these Sepsizonia we read there were at Rome, to wit, the one of Titus in the fireet called Via nova, of right great antiquity, not far from this of Seperat: of which at this day there is to be feen no flew of token at all. The other of Severas, whereof there remain fill, ones against S. Gregories Church 3 Zones of girdles(as it were) of curious work; for the beauty and flatelines of the pillars worth the feeing and pleasant to behold. Hele triumphant arches were created for them only, who having subdued whole Provinces and conquered foresis setions & obrained brane & formulate victories feemed worthy of sriumph, and thereupon they are called Triumphant arches. Upon these archessorthe perpetual and everlassing memoriall of acts atchieved, were cut and engraven the portraitures of the very places. where the war was performed; the refemblances of Eabricks and ranged battels, if the fervice was ont and of thips like were at fee blomber suntill the time of the Emperors no man raised any arches, and in Plinies daise, they beganning to be built fo as that of Time is of all others most ancient. The mount Calim in old time was named Querqueintania, for the number of oaks there growing: but afterwards it was to called of one Calim Vibenian, a Duke of the Tulcan nation, unstowniom the Romans granted a place in that mountain to inhabit. For when as the Tulcan people, by reason of their multitude, and the strong tenced places which they held, were suipedeed, commanded they were to remove into a street which of themselves was named Thusem, But such as were without substitution, kept the hill Calim of the conference of the goddes Diana was worshipped: and at this day there stands the Church conferrated to S. Evangelish the wirgin. This mountain afterwards by Tiberim was named Angulan.

Faunus he was called, and easis, for that he foretold things to come, by voice and not by figns. The Albans in old time inhabited that part of the hill, where at this day, the Church stands of S. Mary Dominick.

In the hill Calius stood sometimes the Temples of Venus and Cupid, not far from the gate Ne-

The Court Hostilia was in two places of Rome, the one in the common Forum, hard by the Temple of Peace, where King Hostilius first dwelt, the other in that place, where afterwards the Church of S. John and S. Paul was built.

A place there was in the mount Calins called Caftra Peregrina, toward the Northeast and the Efastile, where at this time the Church of the four crowned Saints is frequented.

the form of an hemssphere or halfcircle. Some think, that Titus devised the Amphitheatre sint, but some arow and proved, that C. Cefar built the first that ever was in Maris field: but by the authority of Bautronius it is proved, that Statilius seased one Amphitheatre before Titus.

In these Amphitheatres were prizes and rewards propounded to them that would fight with beaths. Condemned persons like wis yielded there to the eyes of men a borrible and fearfullight conheholds so thick were those prisoners brought by the Listors, within that enclosure to wre-file and maintain conflict with wild beats.

The City of Rome in the beginninges hath bests full in the first book, was but narrow of compaissand contained within finall bounds: and the people for commodity and flore of water.

feeled upon the river Tyber. But as the city daily more and more encreased, necessary it was that fome should build them houses and habitation in one place, some in another, farther from the river: whereupon diffteffed it was for want of water, which was to be fetchell fo far off and that with great pain and labour: befides, those places which had no current of running waters to wash away the flith, and carry it into Tyber, became (by the noifome air which was injected with their loathsome and Rinking smels) unwholsome, and Ribje & many times to the pestilence. Prince North watherefore (the Emperor) undertook to redrefs and refledy this mischief (and othersafter him by his example) and deviceby the wit and subtile invention of men, conduit pipes, to bring water into those parts of the city which otherwise had none, And this verily they did two waies, the one byached work, when by digging certain rills or rivinlets the water was carried level above ground, forced by certain weights, ballates, and counterpoifes; the other by vaults under the ground, bringing water into the city by fecret under-waies through pipes, fouts, and rocks. By which means it came to pais, that in the city every where such store there was of water, that each house almost had a well in it, But especially at the bottom and foot of the hill Quirinalis, and all the fide thereof, in the fireet Patricius, Submra, the Latine way, the Aventine, the Jews fireet, and in many other places: so as in this our age full it is of such water-works under the ground Now were these waters conveighed from divers places, and some conduits especially, such as were devised by arches were higher or lower than other. In the beginning and all the former times, there were (by report) five heights or depths: The highest of all was new Anio; next, the waters Claudia; in the third place the water Julia; Tepula in the fourth ; then Martin, and after it old Anio, the levell or current whereof, Virgofolloweth and Applay and the lowest of all others, Alleting, which serves that quarter of the city beyond Tyber, and other low places built upon the plain. These waters were first brought into certain great conduit-heads, and from thence they were by a certain measure distributed by the canduit officer, and for an into places appointed. Now that great conduit head was called Castellum, which receiveth first the common water, and afterwards sendeth it out into divers and fundry parts; and the keeper or officer that overfeeth it is named Caftellarius. There were besides levell or above ground certain cisterns or receptacles of water, which kept water to serve curriers, fullers, and other fuch artificers for their necessary vie. Over these were appointed certain wardens and keepers, and a set number of labourers and workmen to set thereto. Finally, a grievous punishment was to be inflicted upon them that either marred and hurt the conduitheads, or derived and conveyed water to other places than the laws or publike ordinances, or the Cenfors or Adiles permitted; or took more water than at the first was allowed them. Appins Claudius (by saposs) was the first man that brought water into the city by arched work, But of the Reman waters, of the conducts, and other matters ordained thereabout, of the manner of conveyance the influments, measures, and weights thereto belonging read Frontinus, who of these things hath written truly and at large. Also have recourse to Sox, Roff as, who of the same argument hath made a good treatile. In the time of Francisco there were but nine waters and no more brought into the City, namely, Appis,old Anio, Marina, Tepala, Julia, Virgo, Alfielana, Called alfo Angulta, Claudia, and new Mais, Raffasteck opeth ten inote, Whereby It appeareth, that he wrote long after Frontinus.

Of baths and bains in generall.

Herma properly hath the fignification from a Greek word, the good, which betokeneth hot, But Therme properly harn the against action from a clock works, or without them are heat with a well to call those places which either having hot waters, or without them are heat with a clock name. Therme Therme That the Roflouph, appointed either to wash and bath, or to sweat, by the Greek name Therma. That the Romansufed in old to bath and wash themselves oftner than we now adaies, is testified by many and divers authorities of writers : and for fundry causes they were wont to do [as yet the matner is amongst us | namely to scour away (weat, or to wash dust off, in like fort for health and place fure: whereby it came to pais, that every man, if he were but of mean wealth, had in a manner a privat bath or hor-house by himself: but the same were devised and contrived after diversand fundry forts. For many publike baths there were ordained for the common people to use at their pleafure. Serv. Or at a invented first and made the pendant or hanging baths. But after that ribband superfluity abounded in excess, the bathing houses were built with wonderfull cost and magnificence, so as they seemed to keep no mean nor measurers appeareth by the very reliques and mins thereof at this day, And those places where they built these bains and not-houses they called Therme; which contained within them divers places, and an infinit number of roomes, bearing finding names, and ferving to as many uses. For some were appointed to heat water and those were round built) from whencehot water was let into the bains, nos to them only that were on the ground beneath, but also to those which were pendant and hanging alost: which water after they had done walking being soil and good for nothing was conveyed by certain pipes and spouts into finks, They had other rooms allo called Apoditeria, wherein they that were to go into the bath put off their croaths and laid them by. In the fame places were court-yards, having about them most spacious porches or closifers, built with arched and embowed roofs most stately; wherein were marble pillars, garnified with divers and fundry colours. In like manner pavements of stone, and walls feeled and hung with marble tables. Also close walking galleties groves, and swimming places, all for the pleafure and contentment of the people, where they might refresh and solate themselves. These delights so drew and allured mens minds, as that they would wash oftentimes in one day, yea, and in these bains the Princes, were wont to sup and bath with other persons wholoever, as it fell out. They had besides private baths to themselves most sumptuously built, and gorgeously set our, And namely, Amoninus Caracalla, at his own charges edified certain baths, which by his name were called Therma Amonina. The huge roins thereof are yet to be seen some of the pillars still stands, others are thrown down. Some says they were begun only by Antoninas. but finished and adorned by Severus. They flood, about the foot of the Aventine, near the fireteway leading to Ardea, where now is the Church of S. Balbina, Under these baths there stood a most goodly Palace, built by the same Antoninus, but at this day there is scarce any example or shew

The fifth Book.

CHAP. I.

The Etymology of the mount Aventine.

He Aventine is of the Roman hils: he fourth in order. The compass and form whereof. because we have already described in the first book, needless here it is to repeat. But it remaineth to declare, how it came so called, what Temples of the gods, and what other edifices be therein. The Aventine therefore, somethink, took the name of birds which were wont to flie unto this hill, there to neffle: others, of a * King of the Albans, flain and buried * Aventings, there. There be again who suppose, that the Sabins, who being by the Romans enfranchised Citizens, there fetled and made abode gave the name to this hill of Avantes, a river in their Province. Varro affirmeth that it was so called of a ferriage: For as it hath been said a little before this mount was divided from the rest, and from the City by certain lakes and the Tyber, whereupon, they that would go to it used to serry over in small points or wherries. Some guess, that it came to have that name of refort unto it, for that the Latines used in great frequency to repair unto the holy Temple of Diana there. Remarius also it was named of Remus who chose a pla e in the top thereof to fit for to take the flight of birds for Augury, and in the end was there entered . Romulus therefore commanded that it should not be inhabited, because he would have had it wholly consecrated to his brother. This hill Ancus Marrius afterward compeffed with a wall, and granted leave to as manvas would there to dwell: howfoever, there be fome that think it flood void untill the time of Claudius the Emperor of happy memory, as being an ominous place and unfortunat, by reason of foul birds that hanted it, and therefore not to be received within the wals. But the truth is, when the Romans grew populous, they joyned this mountain also to the rest of the City.

CHAP. II.

The Temples of Diana, Dea bona, Hercules Victor, Queen Juno, Moneta, Luna, Victory, Minerva, and Liberty. The Altar of Jupiter Elicius.

N the top of mount Aventine toward the Tyber, there standeth the Church of S. Sabina, that I very place where aforesime was the holy chappel of Diana. The feast and holiday of bondslaves was wont to be kept at Rome the thirteenth day of August, for upon that day Servius Tullius, whose mother was a bond-woman, consecrated a Temple to Diana in Aventine, and ordained it to be a feasival day for bond-servants, who as yet were parronized by Diana, Some think that this chappel was built by K. Ancus of that money which the Citizens conferred and contributed who lately had been translated thither from Politorium. This Temple was common unto all the Latines, whereupon oftentimes they reforted thereunto.

Very near unto that place flood the Church of S. Mary, called Aventina. But intimes past the place was confectated to the goddeis Bona, i.e. good. For Claudina vestall virgin or Nun, built a chappel unto her in the honour of Fassa, fifter of Fassus, a most chafte maid.

Or rathe
Upon the same bank and brow of the hil, where at this day S. Asexiss Church standeth, was some-daughter. * Ot rather time the Temple of Hercules Conqueror, And near unto it another of Juno Regina, built by Camillus with the pillage got in Veis. In the ruinat place of Decius the Emperors bains there was a Temple alfo of Hercules, where the Christians afterwards confectated a Church to S. Prilea.

On the fide of the Avenine hill flood the chappel likewife of the Moon, as Ovid doth witness. Thus much of those buildings in the Aventine, which had a certain placethereupon in our knowhedge : the self following were doubtlefs in the Aventine, but in what part thereof they stood, it is unknown after to long time, and namely, the Temple of Villary built by the Arcadians, and in homonr of whom they offer facrifice yearly. Minerva and Juno had their Temples there in the same hills by the tellimony of approved authors. To Liberty a Temple was built and dedicated by the father of T. Gravebur, with the money taken for fines and forfeitures. The cloitter belonging to that Temple was by Alius Paus and Cornelius Cethegus Cenfors repaired and enlarged, and last of all by Pollio also re edified, Now this S. Liberty the Romans honoured above all others, and in defence and maintenance thereof, they ever shewed themselves most resolute and constant.

Upon the same hill, Numa reared the alter of Jupiter Elicius, so called abeliciando, i.e. of fetching out fearers and hidden mysteries.

Inlike manner there flood an old altar of Murcea in that hill Now they named Venus Murceasof the Myrtle tree confecrated unto her; or as some interpret, because Venus, immoderate and excelfive, maketh a man to be Murcus or Muroidusi.e.fluggifh,floathful,idle,and good for nothing.

The Temple of Juno Moneta was likewise built and dedicated upon that hill, Camillus in the same mount consecrated a chappel to dame Matuta. The wood or grove, also called Laurentum or Laurentina, consecrated unto Jupiter, was there: in which Emperor Valentinian [the fecond] fon of Constantine, and Galla Placidia was flain, as Pliny Witnesfeth, CHAP, III. Cacus, and his hole or Cave.

Acm, by report of the Poets, was the son of Vulcan, whom they believed in old time to breath out of his mouth fire and smoath. This Caem inserted the places near unto him with robbing and spoiling. But more probable it is, that he was a most lewd and theevish servant of Ewinder, and therefore the Arcadians called him xaxov, i.e. naught. A cave he hanted, as by very good conjectures is certainly gathered, in Aventine toward Tyber, over-against the Church of S. Mary Aventine, whereas the river runneth nearest to the hill, and whereas there hangeth over a vast and huge craggy rock, as fit a place as might be to make a starting hole and cave for such an one, and near it is to the gate Trigemina. Him when Hercules had killed and facrificed, he reared an altar unto Jupiter Inventor near to the faid cave or den.

> CHAP. IIII. The Armilustrium, and some other things in generall, Rmilustrium was a place where souldiers shewed themselves and their armor, and where they Anied to muster; where also in their arms they sacrificed and did service to their gods, with resounding loud trumpets. Some would have it to be in the Aventine, others in the Circue Maxie mus: but that matters not much. Hither the fouldiers used to repair when they were returned from war, and here they laid up their harness and weapons. For armor of their own and in their privat cultody the Romans had not, to use in the wars: but delivered all up to be kept safe either in the Armilustrium or the tower or castle upon the rock Tarpeia.

In Aventine, near the Temple of Juno Regina, were the Scala Gemonia, that is to fay, a fleep place with a downfa'l; where wicked malefactors, drawn with a crook were most milerably executed

There flood sometime this hill, near the Temple of Diana, the house of Phyllis.

A part of this mountain was called Kemuria; which Remus chose to dwell in : and being there by his brother Romalus committed to the earth, he gave it his name.

The Senat and people of Rome built in this mountain, to the honour of Decius the Emperor, the baths called Deciana and others also near them, named Variana. Moreover, the bains of Trajan were in this place, where now the vineyard of Francis Albertinus is.

The caves of Faunus and Picus also were in the Aventine as fables report. Italia likewise dwelt in the Aventine as M. Cato recordeth.

The Temples and edifices of this hill all in generall were (by report) burnt in the daies of Tiberius sometime Emperor.

CHAP. V. The speard hill, and other things within that compassion

F'He plain and levell ground between Aventine, Tyber, and the City wall, hath four fides, but uneven; in which there rifeth a little hill, commonly called Testaceus. The whole compais hereof will hardly be measured with 2000 paces; the height is about 160 foot. It resembleth in thew the form of a gourd; and the one fide of it which regardeth the Tyber is broader than the other. Near to this hill was the glas-makers street (and the potters Jaso the carpenters habitation, And no man doubteth, but hereupon arose and grew the mount called Testacens. For in old time, at Rome and elsewhere, as also in some places now adaies, much use there was commonly of earthen vessels made by potters: which even by this may be certainly collected, for that in Numa's daies there were four colledges or focieties of potters : and these made of clay not only vessels, but also the images of the gods, and ornaments to beautifie and set out their Temples: pillars and wals were by potters work feeled in the outlide, nay, the very dead bodies were bestowed in cophins of baked clay. Since then, in so great store of earthen vessels and potters work, much of necessity must needs be broken, which if they had been cast abroad in the corn-field and pasture grounds would have made all barren and unfruitful; again, if they had been thrown into the water, would in time have choaked up the chanell of the current, and forced the river to swell and overflow the banks: Numa therefore commanded this kind of workmen to dwell in one place, and gave order to fling all that was good for nothing, as filth, riff-raff, and broken sheards into one place : whereupon, in process of time arose a mount which they called Testaceus. Among these potters there was a place hallowed to Venus Myrtea, as we find in some records.

CHAP. VI. The Pyramides; the sepulchre of C. Cestius, and the garners of the people of Rome.

The Pyrmides were huge towers four-square rising up in height. Sharp like to a flame, whereof I they have the name & TEV rugos, i.e. of fire. But Stephanus supposeth they were so called, & Tay πιζων, i.e. of wheat, because into that place where they were erected, wheat was brought out of all Agypt; which made a great doarth of corn. Thefeat the beginning were rested by the Kings of Erypt, thereby to spend and consume their superfluous wealth and substance, whereof they had no ute; for fear left if they had gashered goods, and heaped up a deal of gold, filver, and other riches, they should thereby have given occasion unto some for to lie in wait to take their lives away : alio, that the common people should not live in idleness. Afterwards, at Rome likewife they beltowed their money thereupon, for to make the world wonder, and to flew their vain-glory. There is yet one of them to be feen, flanding upright at the gate Hoftienfis, enclofed within a wall. And commonly it is faid, that it was the monument or sepulchre of C. Cellius, one of the leven Septemvirs, called Epulones. But Blondus would feem to prove, that it was the place for buriall of the whole Colledg and Society of those Septemvirs Epulones. Now were they called Epulones, who had the power to ordain and make feafts and solemn bankets to the

It is written, that there were 140 garners of the people of Rome, between the mount Testaceus and Tybre.

In the same compass of ground near Tyber was the lake or pool Hylerna. Some also affirm, that there stood sometime in that quarter a little town called Capena.

CHAP, VII. The freating steeple, and the image of Jupiter.

BY courfethe Efquilie should next follow; but became it lieth between the way Labicana on the Southeast ude, and the valley (which for the breadth of 400 foor encloseth that way) on the West we will rehearle what memorable things soever there be in the Labican way and the val-Nev aforeiaid before we come to the mount Efquilia. In our return therefore to the triumphall arch of Coultantine, whereof we pake before, we will as wago discourse of the rett. Near then unto this arth there appeareth the half rundle or circumference of an old fleeple made of brick, which Wilter calleth the sweating steeple : for that the report goeth, how sometime there gushed water "out of it; whereby the common people, standing to behold the games and plaies in the next scaffolds of the Theatre untill they were athirft quenched their drought.

In the top hereof flood the brazen image of Junier, because their ancestors in old time, were wont when they made tolerin leagues coufe the image of Japiser. But for that it was a trouble either to carry with them or to fend the land image, of pecially the they were to contract and effablish any accords in far remote committee, therefore instead of the complete image they took the scepter only; which might betoken Jupiter the King of the gods, as well as if he had been there present full and whole.

CHAP. VIII. The Amphiebeatre of Titus Volpalianus, The Temples of Fortune and Quies.

To Erween the two hils Calini and Efginiows there an Amphitheatre. This Veffin fan built first, and asterward Tinm his tendedisated and beautified it with the bains, built near unto it with right great celerity and speed. This Amphitheatre was commonly called Colosseum, of Nero's Collesseum fu, which was fee up in the porch of Nero's house. In the same place of the Theatre were the toooles beforetime of Noro, whereof we will speak hereafter in this very book. This Amphitheatrum they called also Arena, e.e. the Sand-floore because the ground was spread over and laid with fand that the wreftlers might fall fofter and take lefs hore; also that the bloud should be drunk up. to the end that the fword-fencers in combat might not be affraid upon the fight thereof, and fo with less the another sand course of the property of the stand last of all, that the champions, whose bodies were anointed with only being believed with the land, might with more ear take bhold one of another. The whole Thearre and place is felf within (which during those daies of the games was covered over with tent-closth) swould seceive 80000 men. But bereof fee more in Plint Pompou Lana and other writers of the Romanacts.

CHAP, IX. of the confession of Hemothe Efquilie as well by Varre antichers is divided into many parts, and each part thereof took name of those captains who in times past; before the City of Rome was built, there inhabited. For one was called Ciffing another, Oppins and a shird Septons, But hereof Verre wrirethiat large! The posterity following changed those names as we shall hereafter hear. Some think that Efquilie took the name of Excubia, i.e. watch and ward. For when Romelus had no very great in Trains the med to have a standing watch by night for fear he should be secretly sorlated and killed or elie turned our of his kingdom. Others inppose it was so named of toulers, who there used to cast forth chaff, and such refuse of light corn, to beguile and catch the poor birds.

The fide of the hill toward the broad way Laticana, which lieth between the Churches of the 40 martyrs of S. Clement, S. Peter in Vinculia, and S. Martin, was called by the name of Carina, as Low feemeth to testifie, From that part therefore, because it was first inhabited, we shall do well to begin our treatife.

CHAP. X. The Carina, be old Curia and the new.

Hefe Carina, according to their model and form were houses like to keels of ships, standing within the Temple of Tellus. Their ruins are vetto befeen near the Church of S. Peter in Vinculis se in bonds.

Near to that place was the old Curia built by Romulus: but the new was erected near to Compitum Fabricium, e. the Quarrefour or crofs way of Fabricius.

CHAP, XI.

The bain s of Titus and Philip ; the statue of Laocoon; the Palace of Veipasian; the houses of Balbinus and Pompey.

Here remain yet to be seen the tokens and prints (as it were) of Titus the Emperors bains, not far from the Church of S. Martin in the hils: for there be great cifterns to receive water, which at this day be called Septem Sala, according to the number of those citterns: and so far reached the home of Neroscalied Aurea, i.e. golden.

Not far from thence, in the year of our Lord 1 506, one Falix a Cirizen of Rome, chanced to find in his vineyard the statue of Laocoon, made by those excellent workmen, Age fander, Polydorus, and Athenodorus, Rhodians who with wonderful cunning portraied and cut most artificially in one intire stone, Laocoon himself, his children, and the admirable windings and foldings of the serpents about them. And now at this day is to be seen at the Vatican, in the palace of Vespasian, near the faid bains of Titus. See more of this you may in Pliny. As for the flory it felf, most learnedly and lively it is fet out by Virgil, and there to be read. Behind these bains of Titus, between East and North the ruins of others belides are thought verily to be those of Philip the Emperor.

Above the bains of Titus, some set Hadrians bains; for that this place is yet called Hadrianelus, By the testimony of Lampridis it appeareth that Balbinus his house was in Carina. There also was Pompeys houle in which Lenaus his freed-fervant taught grammer.

CHAP. XII.

The cliff Virbius, the house of Servius Tullius, the golden one of Neto, and that of Virgil. Mecanas his tower and horizards; the Temples of Fortune and Felicity.

That part of the Equilia, which overlooketh the Church of S. Laurence in Fontana, is named Chivus Virbia; there also is the grove Faguralis, wherein flood the mansion house of Servins

Nero's house, called Golden took up all that space, which from that quarter wherein now Saint Gregories Church standeth, lay between Confrantines arch, the Coloffeum, the Carina Efquilia, and Mecanas hortyards. His house before was in his own fire wherewith he burnt the City confumed also; and when he re-edified it anew, he called it Aurea. The spacious largeness whereof was such, that it had about it three porches of a mile compais apiece. It contained also a pool like another fea: walled it was about, and retembled a very dity. There were to it belonging holts and ham-lets country-like, vineyards passures, woods, and beasts both tame and wild, o' all torts. The house and the porches were double guilded all over, and fer out with precious stones. And in one word there was nothing wanting that might ferve for pleasure or prodigall rior.

In the entry of this house there stood an huge image giant-like, called a Coloffus, 120 foot high. After Nero's death, dedicated it was to the fun, and then changed the name. Now menthink it was called Coloffus, after his name who was the first devicer of all fuch statues.

Within the same house, Nero included also the chappell of Fortune. This goddess being made of the stone Phengites, when all the doors were short, gave light to the whole house within: such raies of radiant brightness casteth this kind of stone from it. This goddess Servius Tullus first confectated and of Segetes i.e. franding corn called her Seia.

At the bains of Dioclefian, there is a freen-way leading up to S. Antonies Church in Efquilia, where flood sometime a most noble tower of Mecanas, within his own hortyards: for those most plealant hortyardswere in the plain of Efquilia. Here-within was Priagus worshipped: upon which ill-favored Idol Virgit hath plaied much in verie, Near the hortvards of Mecanas flood the faid Virgils house.

The Temple of Felicity, which took up a part of that plot where Nero's Gold-house should fland was by him burnt.

Above those gardens or hortvards of Mecanas was raised a wonderful piece of work, called Aggeres Tarquinii Superbi, i.e. Tarquinius bulwarks.

CHAP, XIII.

The Palace of Sisiminus; the plain and market place of Esquilix; the grove Querquetulanus; also that of Juno Lacinia and of Mars; the chappell and alter of Ill-Fortune

The palace of Sifiminus in $Efquilis_1 flood$ (as they fay) where the Church of S, Mary the greater now is,

The plain or field Esquilius, near the tower of Mecenas (called Inter montes) i . among the hils is between the foresaid bulwarks and the City wall. This plot of ground was in times patt called Foculus; because dead bodies were therein burnt. But when the stinking steam thereof was noisom to the City, the Citizens and Augustus Cafar by agenerall consent gave the field unto Mecanas, where he made his goodly hortyards and most dainty gardens. Of which Cicero, with other ipea-

In like manner, the market place Efquilinum was in the fame hill.

That fide of the Efquilia which looketh toward the grove Querquetulanus had in it the grove of Juno Lacinia.

In the same Esquilia was the chappel and altar of Ill-Fortune.

In the way which goeth to the gate Interaggeres, even in the very bulwarks or rampiers of Tarquinius stood the arch of Gordian made of marble, garnished also and er out with ornaments of triumph, Of the ruins thereof was S. Gregories Church in Damafus built,

CHAP, XIV.

The cliff Suburranus; the arch of Galienus; the shambles or flesh-market of Liviagor, as some would have it, Livianum ; the Preneftine way, and the Trophees of Marius.

A T the top or upper end of Suburra was the Clivus Suburranus, to called of Suburra, yielding an easte ascent from thence up into the Esquilia.

Anon you meet with the triumphal arch of Galsen the Emperor (where now Randeth the Church of S. Viens) making a goodly shew of the Tiburtine stone, whereof it was made. Near unto it was the shambles or market-place, called Macellum Livie, or Livianum. This, as some think, took the name of one Macellus; who being a notorious thief, and practifing much to fleal into the City, was in the end apprehended, and by the Cenfors condemned: and his house being seized as confiscat to the City was converted to a place wherein they fold meat and all other victuals; and fo it kept still the name (as is faid) of Macellum. Some are of opinion, that the said house was pulled down, and another built in the ruins thereof, which retained the name fill of the former.

From hence beginneth the port-way Pranestina, and leadeth to the gate Esquilina.

In this way you shall meet on the right hand with a huge bank of brick half ruinat upon which were erected two Trophies of marble; that is to fay, certain posts [like Quintins] standing upright with spoils of enemies hanging thereupon; and they retembled men that were taken priloners. It is faid, that these Trophees were set up by Marius in his triumph for the Cimbrian war: which when Sylla had cast down and overthrown, C. Cafar (afterwards Dictator) erected again. The place of the inhabitants thereabout, is at this day called Cimbram. As touching Trophees, look to read more in Plutarch Valerius Max, and others.

CHAP, XV.

The house of the Elii : the chappell Marianum ; the region or quarter called Tabernola ; the baint and dwelling house of Gordian; the Palace of Caius and Lucius; also the Palace Licinianum.

The houle of the Elisthood in that place where now be the monuments Mariana and the chappel of that name.

The plain part of the Esquidia, between it and the mount Calius, and the Basilica Lateranensis, is at this day called Merulana, for Mariana; and in old time, the region of Tabernola,

Near the Church of S. Eufebins, in the way of Preneftina, was built the bains and habitation of Gordianus. The ruins of those hor-houses are yet to be seen, whereby a man may soon give an estimat, how fair, how flately, and large they were at first.

Between the gates Esquilina and Navia, not far from the walls, there be to be seen certain notable ruins : this they commonly call, the bains of Galutids. But in that place flood, in old time, that heautiful and famous palace which Cefar erected under the name of Cains and Lucius his nephews. Hard by the Church of S. Balbina, whereas now is the Bear called Pilearus, flood sometime the Palace Licinianum.

CHAP. XVI. The water Martia or Trajana; and the Temple of Ilis.

The current of the water Martia, patting by the gate. Trajana through the plain of Efguilian went as far as to the bains of Dioclesian, unto the hils pext adjoyning. This in old time was talled Anfera. It arifeth out of the fpring Piconia in the mountains of the Peligni, and passeth by the Martians country and the lake Fucinus, and fo runneth to Rome; the coldest and most whole fome of all other waters that run into Rome. This water Anem Martin began first to bring into the City: afterward, Q. Martine, furnamed Rex, took it in hand; and a long time after Agricus repaired the conduit thereof. Of it read more in Pliny and Frontinus.

The Temple of Isis is by P. Victor. placed in the quarter Esquilina.

CHAP, XVII. Of Suburra ; the house of Casar and Lalia; and the street Patricius.

Suburra is a fireet of all other most frequented: it beginneth at the Forum Romanum, and goeth on torward directly by the Forum Nerva up to the hanging or rising of the hill called Chouse Suberranus, whereof we have written before in this book; and it endeth where the way Preneftia. na beginneth. Called it was Subarra, either for that it sustained and bare up the Carina and the wall under it : or becaute it lay under the old City : or as Varro thinketh, of the burrough or fireer Succufanus, In this fireet Subarra was the house of Cafar, so long ashe contented himself with a mean citate.

In it were sometimes certain stews and brothel-houses, as Martial writeth.

The fireet Parritius winderh crooked from the hill Viminalistand endeth at the bains of Dioclefia 1. Of it more bath been faid in the former book.

The house of Lalia likewise was in the same street as Martial witnesseth.

CHAP, XVIII, Subburra in the Plain; and the Temple of Sylvanus.

"He mount Viminalis on the West-side of it hath part of the Quirinalis opposite against it: 1 and the vale lying between was named Sabarra the plain.

In the fame valley in times patt were the ten Taberna; fo called of the mimber.

The pit also of S. Proba was in the same hill; which Proba her self made near to the Church of S. Maries in the field.

At the foot in manner of the hill Viminatis, over-against S. Agaitha's Church there stood the Temple of Sylvanus as appeareth by many good tokens.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the hill Viminalis; the Palace of Decius; the Laver of Agrippina; the bains of Olympias and Novatus; the dwelling houses of Q. Catulus, Crassus, and C. Aquilius.

Mero reckoneth the hill Viminalis among the Esquilia, Viminalis it was named of Jupiter Vi-mineus, whose altars were in that hill: or else of plenty of Ohers there growing.

In the highest rising and ascent of that hill, there stood in old time, (where now is the Church of S. Laurence in Panif-perna) the Palace of Decime the Emperor, as may be shewed by the ruins

Not far from the same place, toward the Church of S. Vitalis, were the lavers or washing places of Agripping mother to Nero.

The bains of Olympias were fituat toward Subarra; the tokens whereof are now found in the brow of the hill.

Likewite the bains of Novatus were built upon the hill Viminalis, where the Church of S. Pru-

CHAP. XX

The bains of Dioclefianus; the Library Ulpia; the plain Viminalis; the gate Interaggeres; and the vale Quirinalis.

The bains of Dioclesian are to be seen all ruinar on the side of the hill Viminalis: and by their ruins a man may easily gather how stately and magnificent they were sometime. These were begunly Dioclesian and Maximinian Herculanus: in the building whereof 40000 Christians were held to work many years together in most slavish manner.

These were afterwards finished and dedicated by Constantine and Maximinian, new Emperors. Of the vain and superfluous expences which the Romans laid out upon Bains, read Seneca, who depainteth out their wastiulness most excellently.

In the same bains was the Library Ulpia, which by Hadrian, or (as some think) by Trajan, was thither translated; wherein were the linen records, and those huge volumes, called the Elephantine books in which the acts of the Emperors satid all the fanctions and ordinances of Senat were, as Pollio witneffeth.

Behind these bains, from above the rampier or bulwark of Tarquinius Superbus, was the plain field Viminalis, which ipreadeth out as far as to the City wall. There is feen as yet the gate Interagreres thut; albeit it feemeth more probable and like to a truth that it flood in the plain Ecquilinus.

In that very place there was a pit or well of spring running water, which the neighbours dwelling thereby called the pit of the Vivariam, or the park pit, within which park they kept enclosed divers and fundry kinds of wild beafts. The harbors and dens of these wild beafts are yet to be feen; whereupon it cometh, that those places or parks which are let out and appointed for feeding of Deer, we use to call Vivaria.

The space between Dioclesians baths and Constantines arch is named the vale Quirinalis: in which they fay, that Romulus met with Procelus.

In the same was the sacred chappell of Fortuna Publica.

The mount Caballus : the Etymology of Quiribalis : the tower Militiarum: the bains of Paulus; the channell of Neptune : the bains of Constantine : the houle and street of the Cornelii

THe hill which at this day they name Caballus was in old time called Quirinalis, as by many figns and reasons may be proved; to as no man skilfull in the Roman story, need to doubt

This Quirinall hill, the fixt in order of the mountains of Rome. (as Varrotellifieth) taketh that name of the Temple of Quirinus after others, of the Quirites, who coming with I atsus from Cares, there pitched their tents and lodged. This mountain is shaped long, for it comprehende hthat ittle hill which is between the gate Collina and Collatina, Upon it standeth the Obelick of the Moon, engraven with Ægyptian hieroglyphick characters. In breadth, from the North Southward, it reacheth to a tower now called Comitium.

In the pitch and top of the hill, above the Forum of Trajanus, you shall see the tower called Min litiarum; where in old time the fouldiers of Trajan kept their standing guard, and gave the tower

On the same ridg were the bains of Paulus built: which place at this day by a corrupt name, is called Bagnana-Poli

In the defcent and hanging of the Quirinall hill toward Suburra flood sometime the chappell of Noptano which appears by the pictures and other resignes there found.

From hence toward the North were the hot-houles of Constantine, as the ruins of the place do

The house of the Cornelis was built in the fireet so called, and at this day the name it keepeth fill. But more hereof eliewhere.

CHAP. XXII.

The Temples of Saturn, the Sun. and Bacchus; Quirinus his Temple and porch; the old Capitoll; the Chappels of Jupiter Juno, and Minerva; the house of Pomponius Atticus.

IN the Cornelian freet (whereof a little before we made mention) were two gyant-like images. a called Coloffi relembling two old men, naked, and holding Cornucopia in their hand. It is commonly received, that these were the flatues of Saturn and Mars; for that certain it is how their Temples flood hard by : and many evidences there are, befides the very ruins thereof, which teftifie to much

Over-against the hot-houses of Constantine, upon the very brow of the hill, there standeth to be seen one half of a marble tower, which the people dwelling thereby call Mesa. This, men think, was the tower of the Sun, by the ornaments there reared and fet up by Aurelian: for this Emperor worshipped the Sun above all other gods; and therefore you shall see stamped in his coin this inscription; Soli invitto, To the invinsible Sun His mother allo, a Priest of the Sun thereupon reared a Temple unto the Sun.

In the fide of the hill near the foresaid baths are two horses seen standing; the handy-work of Praxiteles and Phidias. These were (by report) Tiridates the Kings and translated to Rome.

That part of the Quirinalis which boundeth upon Vallis Martia was called the mount and Temple of Clarra and Apollo.

Not far from thence behind this hill, there is another rifing and afcent; where by antique letters it is evident that the old Capitoll stood together with the chappel of Jupiter, Juno and Minerva.

Over-against these places, enclining toward the right hand, where now standeth the Church of S. Vestalis, Pomponius Attions dwelt in an house which came to him by inheritance from his grandfire, and was called Pamphiliana. They write, that this was a most tweet and pleasant seat, by reafon of a wood near unto it.

In the same place was built afterwards the Temple of Quirinus, kept alwaies shut to signific that it was an unknown fer ret; whether Romulus were enterred and lay in the earth, or were translated into the number of the gods in he ven.

There was a porch or walking place there of that name; where folk used commonly to meet, to dispatch businesses and contract espousals.

CHAP. XXIII.

The wath way or caufey called Alta; the house of Sabraus; the firest and flatue of Mamurrus; the Court and vardens of Saluft, and the field or plain Sceleratus.

Fiel High caulty reaching from the baths of Conffantineto the gate Viminalis along the fide of Quirinalis was paved with fouriquate stone.

'thon that causey, at a place called the Pomgranat, Flavius Sabinas had an house, wherein, by report, Domitian was born.

It is avouched in old time there was a fireet of Mamurrus: and that his flatue there flood where now is S. Sufans Church.

Not far from that Church was the Court of Salaft, and his most near and fine hortyards, where the field called Sceleratus lay, and reached near the gate Collina. Of those hortyards as also of the hamlet Tiburtina, there yet continue fome marks and remnants in the beatom of the valley, hetween the very hill and the way which bringeth to the gate Salaria. On that little hill is seen the very house of Saluft, which the people there inhabiting call Saluftrium, Of this matter see more in

Beyond the hortyards of Saluft, near the gate Collina, there is an high place like a mount; where in times past the vestall vorary Nuns, such as were condemned for incontinency and incest, were buried quick; and thereupon all the plain about it was called Sceleratus, together with the way that leadeth thereto.

CHAP, XXIV.

The Temples of Salus, of Dins, Fidius, of Fortuna Primigenia, of Honor, Hercules, and Quirinus; alfo the Senat-house of women.

"He mount Quirinalis had very many Temples & Chappels, although the certain place where they flood is not fo well known at this day, namely, one of Apis. That of Salus was painted by Fabins Pictor, and burnt in the time of Claudins. By Junion Bubulous Dictator when he triumwhed over the Equians it was vowed by him (Cenfor) pur to making, and in his fecond Dictatorship dedicated.

* Deus Trino-

minis Sabino-

* Sanstin Ding and Fiding, were the Sabins gods, which, when they left their native country and home, with all their other houshold gods, they carried with them into mount Quirinalis, This god (forfooth) was in words and name three, in deed and truth one one as they faid. Thefe three therefore had one temple built them upon this hill, and were called by one name, Santhu. The opinion received of which godhead was fach, that an oath was thought to carry a great power offanctity and holiness, whereby a man in that threefold name and one Deity, avowed and fware thus, Me-Dius Fidius.

Domitianus; a Prator or Lord Chief Justice within the City of Rome, built a Temple upon that hill to Fortuna Primigenia,

Befides, in that mount were the Temples of Honor and Hercales.

Likewise the Council-House of women was in the mount Quirinalis, at which in former times the wives and dames of the City met yearly upon certain folemn fet daies.

Moreover, it is recorded, that the feast Agonalia was celebrated in Quarinalis.

CHAP. XXV.

The Court or Forum Archimonium ; the pullar Tibutina ; the house of Martial ; the Cirque of Floralia ; the Temple of Flora ; the flops of Minium, and the common afcent called Clivus Publicus.

Between the hill Hortuforum (whereof ye may read before in the first book and the chapter next following) and Quirinalis there is a valley fourfquare, but lying somewhat in length. In that pare thereof which lieth under the mount of Clara and Apollo; was the Court called Archimonium. For the very Church of S. Wicheles, which at this day standeth upon that place is named De Archimoniis

Not far from it there is another place, to wit, Pila Tibertina: There flood the house of Martial, as he himfelf witneffeth.

Next to it followeth the round Cieque (Floralium) where yearly to the honour of the goddels Florastite feativali Ploratia is celebrated. Now this Flora was a famous currezan or firumpet at Rome, who having by her whorish eradegathered a mighty deal of goods together, in her last will made the people of Rome her hou, with this condition, That every year they should celebrate the memorial of her birth day. But the Senat thinking this a ridiculous mockery, to honour and dignifie for fi thy a thing with such a remembrance, they devised a goddess of flowers, for footh, called Flore, and her upon those holidaies they seemed to please and content, that she would be good to the growth of trees and corn, and that they might do well in their flowring and blooming time. To this golders we reside that a Temple likewise was confectated: Anon you meet with the workhouses where they make Minium, e. Vermilion, Near unto which was the Clivus Publicus, CHAP.

CHAP. XXVI. The hill Hortulorum, the Temple of the Sun, and the Sepulchre of Nero.

"His little hill(Hortulorum)containeth but a few things worth the writing. Among which is the house of Pincism a Senator, who gave the name both to a gate and a mountain, which in these daies are called Mount Pincius and gate Pinciana,

The reliques and marks of his house are seen in that very place, near the old wall. And about the same wals we meet with an huge building in form of an hemisphere or half cacle, which men imagine, was the Temple of the Sun.

Hoon the fame hill over-against the comb of Marcellus in the very port way Flaminia, fast by the monument of Domitian (tood Nero's sepulchre also.

Now this hill Hortulorum took the name of certain hortyards and gardens under it, which in old time, by reason they were continually so well watered were most iroitfull. Down this will all they were wont (in times past) to descend into Campus Martins, who meant to see and stand for any Magistracy.

CHAP, I.

Of the flat plot of the City, and the Theatre in generall.

Hat it may be understood more certainly in what place of the plain and levell part of the City every thing stood, let there be a streight and right line drawn from the Capitolle through Pantheon to Tybre, near the Church of S. Roch. So shall the City be in manner divided into two equal parts. The one shall lie from the front and side of the Tyber, the other from the Forum of Trajanus to the gate Flumentana, along the foot of the two hils Quirinalis and Hortulorum.

Begin we will therefore at the Theatre of Marcellus, and recount the places in order, as hitherto we have done. As for Theatrum, a Greek word it is, and in Latine may be apely translated Viforium. The first Theatres were appointed among the Athenians and those in regard of husbandmen, who on setting all daies visited the Temples of the gdds: a fire wards, at Rome they began to be taken up. The first, and that the greatest of all others was built of timber by M. Scaurus for, the concavity within would receive 80000 men. After it, were Theatres made to turn about and and shew their front one while this way, another while that. But as touching Theatres, see more in Cassindarius and Vitruvius, who have written plenteously thereof, and namely, by whom they were first ordained and in what manner built.

CHAP. II.
The Theatre of Marcellus and the Library: the gallery and court of Octavia.

A Legister built many things under the name of others, as we find written by authors in fundry works. And among the reft was the Theatre of Marcellus his nephew or confin by his fifter Octavia. A part hereof is yet to be feen between the Capitoll and Tyber, where now flandeth the palace of the Sabelli. It was able to contain 80000 men. See more thereof in Asconius.

Hard by the very same Theatre was the gallery of Octavia, teared by the said Angustus for his sithe Octaoia's fake. Therein were certain curious pieces of work wrought by Praxieles, and namely, the ravifing of Proferpina. The portraiture of Bacehus & Satyrus, Allo Apollo Diana, and thenine the raviting of respersion, the post attue of buccome of surface of the mules, the workmanship of Timarchider. Within this gallery or walking place, Pliny saith, there Rood achappel of Juno, and the image of the said godders. Fait by the said gallery flood the court or palace of Octavia, and in it Cupid portraied with lightning in his hand. It took up in times past as great a space, as at this day the Churches of S. Nieholas in Carcere, and S. Marr in Porticu.

After the death of Marcellas, Oftavia his mother fet up a library near his Theatre, Now the first that ever ordained, That books of all learning should be in some publike places bestowed for to be read of all that would come; was at Ashens Pififratus the tyrant, and at Rome Afinius Pollio.

> CHAP. III. The Cirque or Gem-place Flaminius, and the Temple of Apollo.

That this Cirque Flaminius stood in that place where at this day the dark store-houses and sellars be, hard by S. Katharins church, the marks yet remaining testifie. Flaminius it was called, either because it was built about the plain called Campus Flaminius, or else by Flaminius the Cos. who was flain at the battell of the lake Thrasymenes. In it were the plaies and games exhibited, which they call Anollowings: and therein the horse-runnings were performed. To it the Senat used oftentimes to come down from the Capitoll to fit in councill. Nepsune also had a chappell there.

The Topography of Rome. III5

Apollos Temple was in that very place, as it evidently appeareth, where now S. Maries Church is under the Capitoll, between the herb-market and the Chaque Plamininus, near to the gate Carmentalis.

CHAP. IIII. .

The Temples of Vulcan, Mars, Bellona, Hercules, and Jupiter Stator: the column or pillar Bellica: the altar of Neptune : the gallery Corinthia : und the Coloffe of Mars.

7 Ithin the Circue Flaminian flood most famous Temples of the gods, to wit, of Vulcane. Mars, and Bellona, to wit, that which was toward the gate Commentalie. Before the faid gate there flood a marble pillar, which the Romans called Bellica, for it shewed when war was to be made. The Romans in old time used and retained this manner in proclaiming war: The publike headle, or one of the heralds called Facials, lanced a spear with some other ensigns of war, into that land upon which they meent to levy arms. But when after many conquests they had enlarged their empire and dominion, and that they were oftenimes to give defiance to nations far remote and distant, because they should not need to sling a spear or javelin, as I said before into that land they did but flick one in the pillar abovenamed, on that fide which regardeth that part whither they were to make their expedition.

To Herenks the Great, protector and keeper of the cirque Flaminius, they built a Temple in the same place: for his statue was there exected in the very entrance thereof, on that side where now flanderh the Church of S. Lucy in the dark Apotheca.

M. Fulviss built another Temple of the allowance that he had of the Cenfors stock, to Heresles Musarum: for he had heard in Greece how Hercules was Musagetes, i.e. the leader and companion of the Mules. The same Fulving translated the images of all the Mules out of the town Ambracia to Rome, and confectated them under the protection and fafeguard of that most potent and mighty deity, to the end that they might have mutuall help one of the other: namely, the quietness of Mules by the desence of Hercules; and the valour of Hercules, by the sweet voice of the Muses. This Church much decaied and disfigured by time, Martin Philippu, August us his father in law, i.e. his mothers husband repaired. In the same Cirque they would have the Temple of Japiter Stator to stand.

There also as they gather by certain prefumptions) was the altar of Neprune, which in old time

Offavius reared a porch of gallery built and born up with brazenpillars, and thereupon numed Corinthia. This food between the Cirque and S. Nicholas Church, and was also called Chaloaria. , e brazen or copper.

The Colois of Bately of Mars, at the Cirque Flaminius, was in the Temple of Brutus Callaine.

The porch or gallery of Metcuty: the Theatre of Octavius: his house, cloifter, and gallery:
and the Temple of Venus Victorie.

Between the Cirque Flaminius and the Tyber, in the very entry of the Church of S. Angell in Pifcina, there is a porch or gallery confectated fometime to Merenty, 01,28 fome would have it, to Juno. This being confumed with fire, L. Septimins Severus reedified. But the porch which flandeth in the Tews flacet called Cours, they fay was builded by the Emperour Severus.

Between the gallery of Marcellus and the mount reared by Hadrian, Pompey was the first ther built a Theatre to continue, For all others before were taken down when the games and flews were once done and past : and when need required new were fet up. A great part of this Theatre when Pompey had finished comes Caligula and made an end of the rest. Afterward, Theodorick K. of the Oftragoths reedified it. This also received eighty thousand men.

Near upto this Theatrum there was a court or flately Hall called Arrium, the fame which at this day they name Sarrium; also the house of Pompey &c a porch before it. These edifices of Pampey, at what time as Philip exhibited the stage-plaies, were confumed with fire. Near to the same theatre the emperor Claudius of famous memory, reared an arch of marble for memorial of Tiberius Cafer.

In the forefaid Theatre(men fay) was the Temple of Venus the Victress.

CHAP. VI.

The bains Agripping: Pantheon, and the porch thereof: alfothe Temple of good freed

TRom the arch of Pomper, as you go northward, you shall meet with the baths Agrippine, the marks whereof are feen in that place which now of the inhabitants there, is called Cyambella. Now, Agripping they were named of Agrippa who built them: See Pliny hereofin his discourses of Nature.

Near unto the forefaid bains, there is a Temple of greatest antiquity, and among other old Temples of the city, the noblest of all the rest, which at this day remained in manner whole and found. Because it was dedicated almost to all the gods, they thought good to name it Paintheon. In form it was like the world, representing a sphere or globe. At this day they callie S. Maries the round. Of the temple, Pliny and others have made mention, unto whom I refer the readers. In the very porch and entry of this temple, were the frames of Angaiffus and Agrippa. The images of Mars and Vems. At the lappet of Venus car, there hang as a pendant that most coffly pearl of Claspara, Likewije there though the image of Minerva, the handy work of Phidias. Moreover, Herenles at whole statue the Carthaginians in old time used yearly to sacrifice mankind. They ascended up to this temple as in the reft, by many steps : for men in times palt used to rear the temples on high and made but one way to go into them. A porch to this temple Agrippa joined is peece of work worth all admiration, which of some was called Prethyren, For this word Perticins, betokeneth nos thing else but an ornament or porch, med Tils theas, to before the dore, Herof allo bave authors Written much. This templefirst Hadrian the emperor of happy memory, and afterwards Amonins Pius reedified.

Certain reliques and remnants four angled and fomewhat long, of Good-speeds temple, are evidently feen in the freets of Minerva and S. Enfrachins. This god was long ago worthippedathat all things might fall out happily in the end. Portraied he was in babit of a poor man sholding in his right hand a charger, and in the left an ear of corn.

CH A P.VII.

The baines of Nero and Alex inder a the Cirque named Agon.

Ebind S. Eustachius church, between Pautheon and Lombards-Recet, the remnants are seen Dof the baines and vaults of Nero.

Neer unto these Alexander built others new(by conveighance of water into them, which they they call Alexandrina) and thole very fair and delectable : Wherof Lampridins hath written much. Necrunto them (fome think) were the baths of Hadrian : and they would have them to frand in that very place where now is S. Aloifius church,

In the plain part of the City there appear most evident tokens of a long and spatious Circuas which they call at this day Agon, It took that name either of the games Agonalia inftituted by K. Numa in the honour of Janus, which in that thew place are represented the o day of January; or because all manner of such the wes and disports, called by the Greeks Agones, were wont there to be exhibited. Some would have it to be built by Nero or Alexander, upon this reason, that other ornaments of theirs were to be shewed there. For the maner of the Princes and Emperors was. ordinarily to befrow their monuments and memorials in one place.

CHAP, IX.

The temple of Neptune, Terentus : the Alter of Disor Pluto : the marife Captes.

N the firend of Tybre, where now S. Blajes Church ftendeth, fometimes Neptunes temple flood. The same was rebuilt by Hadrian. Therein were the painted tables hung, were reprefented the ship wracks.

Teventus is a place in Mars field, to called, for that in it the alter of Dis was hiddens or because the water of the Tybre running thereby, cat away and wore the banks of that fide : or lattly by occasion of Evander, who arrived with a fleet in that place, and there abode. There also in time of the Alban war, they hid the altar of Profespina under the ground, that they only might have knowledg thereof, where it was.

In the same Mars field (some think) was the sen or marish Caprea, where Ramalus in a tempest which juddsinly arofe, was taken a way. Of which matter Livy writeth,

CHAP. X.

The house Corving : the breadway or gate : and the temple of Ilis;

"He second part of the flat City, reached along the foot of Quirinalis, from the Forum of Trajames to the gate Flaminia. In which part neer the Capitol, was the house Coroina, built by that name and smily, and to this day keepeth full the old name; for commonly called it is Macellum Corverses.

From that house unto the bars or railes in Mars field, extendeth the way Lata, retaining yet the antique namerand there thandsto the courch of 5 Marses in the broad way.

In the same way stood sometime by report, the semple of Ifs neer the rails above faid, where now in the church of S. Marcelles. Now this Ifs was a goddesse of the Repytians, the was bonoured and worthipped also at Same, together with Office immaned Same, so whom the publick plaies in the inparteff lessists form Sorapens here the name, it beyond in the temple of fir that inself was committed, whereapon the Roperor Tiberies cauled the Priefts of that temple to be crucified, it the place it ielf to be demolifhed. Other temples of this goddesia there were at Rosse, for Coracale translated all her facted rites and caremonies to Rome, and daily with exceeding great reverence observed the lame.

CHAP, XI.
The arch of Camillus: the temple of Minerva; and the swine market.

As a man goeth down from the broad-gate aforcfaid toward the Pantheon, he shall see a most Ancient arch. Some think (but untruely) that ercested it was for Camillas: for many a fair day after bit time, these arches were in no request and us: and therefore it belonged to some other L. Generall, Between this arch and Pantheon, (n. Pempsius built a temple to Minerva, wherein he comprised in a compendious sum, the memoriall of his ass and exploits. Other ensignes also in the honour of the City of Rome, he there set up, and those he garnished and adorned. Whereof read Plins.

At the foot of the mount Quirinalu, in the hort-yards and the Columnen for, neer to the alcent & riling of the hil which leadeth now into the mount Caballus, there was formtime the market-place Suariums, to called of felling of twine there, For Varro witneffeth, that in old time they had certain let and appointed places for the felling of certain things, and thereof the market stooke the name. Thus of exent, the market Boarium; of fills, Pifearium, of lwine, Suarium; of worts or herbs, Holitorium, was called, &c.

CHAP. XII.
Of the field called Martius, or Tyberinus.

Porafmuch as in the former book it hath been sufficiently declared as touching Mars field, where it laysit shall be needlesse to make any repetition thereof in this place : but why it was called Marsins, would be here in brites considered. Named so it was because it was concerated to Mars: for when the Tarquins were expelled out of their Kingdom, what ground or standing corn they were possessed of they divided amongh those Citizens who were not landed at all, requiring only this field Marsins: which because it was consecrated to Marsins in it the games and plaies should be solemmized and the youth exercised; they shought that the fruit also there growing should likewise becomed sacred and accurred, and so deemed it unlawful that any distribution thereof should be made, but threw it all into the Tybre, whereof arose the Hand called Tybrina; of which we will speak in the last book. In this field, therefore (besides the native beauty of the place and the delectable sight of the medows) were erected the ornsments and statues of brave & renowned perfors; yes, and out of the very Capitoll (when the place began to be pettered and over-stringsh by reason of somany ornaments which their were daily brought, many of them were from thence translated into Campus Marsins. This field was called of men in old time, Tyberinus, like as Tybre also was named Marsins.

CHAP. XIII.

The porch, the temple, Column, and Palace of Antonius Pius: the rails or enclosure, called Ovilia.

Detween the Sciarra & Pantheon freets, neer to Saint Stephene Church in Trallie, there shew-Detha stately porch, which most men suppose was that of Antonius Pius, for thus his temple standeth soneer. The Column allo of Antonius is not far off, This he raised of an exceeding height with winding and turning stairs, like that of Tralamus, whereof we have spoken before, Between this Column and the water Virgo, they say, the rails or encelosite within Mars field stood, called Septa. Now this place was enclosed within wooden rails and strongly senced with posts on overy side, wherein the people of Rome when at the creation and election of magistrats they were to passe their voices were kept close: and for the resemblance of sheep pens, Owilia of some they were called. By Livy they are set down, neer the waies Romieus and Flaminia.

CHAF. XIV.
The bill Citatorum: the Villa Publica, semple of Neptune, and the bridg in Mars field;

Die tween Antonines Column and S. Lawrences church in Lucina, there is raifed a mount, called Diow Citerius; for Citaterum; notit was a mount indeed, but because the people of Rome, when in the chasing of magistrats they were to give their voices, as they were cited, went think as it were unto some bill. Some fayit was called Acceptorum, of taking the peoples infrages: or there Septerum, for the vicinity of those Septe beforefaid. This little mount, there be that would have to rise and increase by the rains of some porch or subset gailery; or else of the common Horkly, called Filla Pablica. For there was in times pittle place called Filla Pablica, a large building in manner of a court or hall; wherein were received and entertained all embassadors of encines, who might nor be allowed either to enter into the City, or go into the publick lodging or hospit, called Grazeostasis.

Neer to the Sopra, M. Agrapa (as Denie writeth) built a goodly temple with a most beautiful porch to it, in the honour of Nepsune.

At this forefaid hillock called Citaterum, and the Column of Antonius, there was a bridg falt by the Sept.s, whereupon they that were cited, when they had given their voices, paffed by and went their waites: and so were severed from the rest that were to give their suffrages, because they should not be entermingled amongst them, nor be able to shew nato them, on whose side they had passed their voices.

In the fame Mars field, it is recorded that in times past stood the temple of Piety, even whereas now the church of S. Savier is.

CHAP.XV.

The water Virgo : the lake and chappel of Inturna, as also that of Piety.

He water Virgo, which reteineth still the pleasant sweetness to the talk in drinking, and keepeth yet the old name, beginneth to gather to an head neer the bridg Salarins i, and being carried in a most deep gutter centreth into the City at the gate Collina, and to is raised to the hill Horintorium: where, by arched work it is conveighed through Mars field, and yeelds all the way to the inhabitants, water for their use; and endeth at the length in the horivards of Lucalins.

Moreover in Mar. field, there was (as men fay) a fountain and well or ciftern of Inturna, fifter of K. Turnas, yeelding most holesome water. This water-Nymph, they avouch (and that right well) to have been called Issarna, a juvando, is of helping; bocaufe she was thought to help the fick. The very place is at this day by a corrupt word, named Larregio.

CHAP. XVI.
The arch of Domitian: the obelisk of Mats field: the Amphitheatre of Claudius the Emperor.

The triumphant arch, so dissembled (as it were) and bereft of all his ornaments, standing between churches of S. Sylvestre and Laurence in Lucium, and taketh up a peece of the way of street Flammia, is attributed to Domitian the Emperor. And hereupon besides others presumptions) they appropriate it to him, for this emperor reared many such arches in every place.

The Obelisk also there is in this Mats field, which Augustus transported from Hieropolis a City in Agypt to Rems. Besides, the native ensigns and wonderfull hieroglyphick inscriptions which it brought with it of the own, therein to be seen, Augustus adjoined other ornaments no less ormitable. But hereof it is better to read Pliny.

Claudius the Emperor built neer the Sepia in Mars field an Amphitheatre, which he decked & adorned with fair statues and most beautiful columns.

CHAP. XVII.

The vale Martia; the palace: the porch of Augustus : the Naumachie of Domitian and the temple of the family Flavia.

He vale Martia taketh the name of Campus Martius: it lyethbetweer. Tybre and the hil Hortulorum: within the which in a place lower then all the reft about it, appear the Naumachies of Domitian; where in old time he exhibited fluews of naval fights. In which place beforetime likely it is, that Augustus had his Naumachie; which being cleanted and foured by Domitian, teteined afterwards his name. Read Soutonius.

Near to the Naumachie, was the temple (as it is thought) of the kinred Flavia. In this place, Julius Capitolinus proveth that the porch and palace of Angustus was built.

CHAP. XVIII.

The Mansoleum of Augustus: and the two obelishs neer it a also the tomb or sepulchre of Marcellus.

In the vale Martia, between the way Flaminia and the bank of Tybre, hard by S. Roches church, Augustus made a Manjolenn, to lerve for a sepuchre as well to himself and all the Emperors, as also for his whole house and name. This building is like unto a turret standing at the gate called Populi, which showen it telf spoiled now of all the ornaments that set it out. Men would have it to be the sepulchre of Marcellus. And Augustus, named this sepulchre of his, Manjolenn, for the resemblance it had of that of Mappolens K. of Caria, which Artemisa his wife built for him. Read Cassinglas Strabo, and others thereof.

Close unto the Manfoleum of Angustus, were two obelisks, as the ruinat remnants thereof do tellific.

CHAP, XIX.

The way Flaminia: the Trophees of Marius, other goodly ornaments of the field Martius in general.

Nens Flaminius the collegue of M. Lepidus, bauing vanquished the Ligurians, paved the causelection of threet Flaminia. This was led from Placence, through Namia, Fuligneum, Nacira, Callium to Fortunes temple, to Pifaurum, and so forward to Ariminum. See Livy and Suctonius.

Between the Maujoleum of Augustus, and the hill called Horenforum, were the Trophees of Marius overfugursta, Trophees as Varro witnesseth, were so called of 5500 facek word, which signifieth, slight; for that the manner was to hang up the spoils and disrobings of enemies put to she has a lain, upon trunks and posts.

In Mars field, were the tepulchres of Sylla, Hirtins, and Panfa, of Inlia. Britannicus, Drafas the Emperor Claudius, and other right hardy and valiant knights, befide infinit ornaments more, whereof we have written before in this book.

The seventh Book.

CHAP. I.

Of the river Tybre.

T should follow by due course and order to treat of Ianiculum and all that quarter of the City on I the other fide of Tybre: but because these parts are separate from the rest of the City by the river Tybre between; thereof also it is meet to say somewhat briefly. And first verily the reason of that name should be showed. Some think therefore, that the river was called Tyberis, Sim Tile Below. For the Sicilians when as in old time they had overcome the E Carthaginians in battel, and taken a number of them priloners, enjoined them, for the better fortification of their own City, to cast a trench about it, and to let water thereinto : and this ditch in reproach of their enemies, they called Been. And the same men upon a time afterwards, when as they encamped neer Rome, gave this very name unto this river lalto, whereas before it was called Albala. Some think it was named to of Tyberis a King of the Tulcans, flain upon the banks thereof. Varro is of opinion, that it took the name of Tibertus, a neighbour Prince of the Veientians. In holy writings we read it Tyberinus. In vulgar speech they call it Tyberis: in poetry, Tybris. In old time it was termed Rumon, as it were gnawing and eating the banks thereof. Also at one side of the City it was named Terentus, as a man would fay, wearing the banks. It springeth from the Apennine, above Aruns. At the first it is but small and shallow, but before it entreth into Rome, it (having received 40 other rivers) is encreased to such bigness, that thips of burden and the greatest hulks, may come up in it as far as Rome. This river divideth Tufcan from Vmbria, the Sabins countrey and the Latins, entreth at the North part of the City, and to passeth through Southwards, between the gates Hoftsenfis and Portuenfis, leaving Innienlum on the right hand and the City on the left, and fo neer unto Hoftia is discharged into one mean broad stream, and falieth into the Tyrrhene les. Upon the banks thereof, as if they were confectate to some divine power, it was not lawfull to fet up any building. Certain warders and keepers there were appointed, for the chanell and the banks. But of this river, Pliny and others have left much in writing.

CHAP. II. Of the bridges built upon Tybre.

The Tybre, as is abovefaid, being so deep as that it is navigable, and beareth the greatest ships, hath no toord in any place that can be waded through; and therefore necessary it was to make bridges over it; and to to join that part on the farther side of Tybre, to the rest of the City. He. caster, after he had killed Geryon, built a bridge, where afterwards shood that which they called Sublicius. Also before the foundation of the City, there was a bridg over Tybre, called Sacer; upon which they sacrificed men to Satura by throwing them down into the river. But when Heren-less attendants had put do own that mane of sacrificing, he gave order, that mens images made of reeds and bulrushes (which they called Argaes) should be cast down in stead of them. But after the City was built, there were other bridges made to the number of eight; to wit, Milvius, Eliss, Vaticaus, Janiculens, Cessus, Fabricius, Palacinus, and Sublicius. And all these, save the sublicius only, Ivilas overthew.

CHAP. III. The bridge Milvius.

The bridg Milvins, which men now call Molvins, flandeth upon the way Flaminia, a mile and more from the City. Built it was in the trouble fome times of Spla, by Scanras when he was Cenfor. Many a time they say it was cast down, and as often set up again.

CHAP. IIII. The bridg Elius, now S. Angel, the Vasicas or Triumphal the Ianiculentis or Aurelianus.

The bridg at this day called S. Angel, in times past Elius, took that name of Elius Hadrianus, for he built that brdg, and neer unto it a sepulchre, which they call Moles Hadriani.

Beneaus. Beneath this is another which giveth passage into the mount Varican and the plain thereof, and thereupon they named it Varicans; allo Trinsimphalis, for that over it they went up in triumphto he Capitol, to eive thanks to Inpite and te joice. The piles are yet to be feen in Tyber, overagainst the spittle of the Capitol of S. Spirit. The third bare the name Lanculons of Innividuals need unto it, and Anrelians; of the port-way Anrelia, or the gate so called. Antenna Pini paved it over with mathle, and being demolished in the civil wire, swas called the broken bridg. Afterwards Pope Xysis: the fourth reedified it, and gave unto it his own name.

CHAP. V' The brigdes Fabricius and Cestius.

Beasth the bridg Aurclius one furlong, over-sgainst the Theatre of Marcellus, in the very midst of the channell of Tyber, there appeareth a shelfer sland, this was united to the City by the bridg Tarpeius, so called sift of the rock Tarpeiuncer unto it, afterwards Fabricius, of L. Fabricius, who by that bridg conjoined the City and sland together. The same at this day is called the bridg of four heads, taking the name of four marble images with four sices appeared, standing at the entry of the bridg, but that bridg which cloten the faid sland with the part within Tyber, was called Elgalithius or Cestus; in times past, but now S. Barthoimers bridg.

CHAP. VI.

of this Islands beginning, we have treated before in the description of Mars field. Livy and Dionysius also let down this story at largh. It resembles the form of a birame gally, and where it is broadelt, it is not above a dart shoot over, in length it containes about two states or a quarter of a mile. This was in times past called Lycania, and was hallowed to the honour of Epidamrus; whole image from out of Epidamrus; was this bet brought. Of Esculapius and his temple read Pliny.

A temple also of Jupiter standeth in it dedicated by C. Servilini the Dunmvir, which had been vowed by L. Farins fix yeers before the Gauls war.

In the fame illand were fick folk prefented unto Afeal apins (in the field.) And neer unto the temple of the faid god, was a lazar-houle, for that this god was the inventer and maintainer of Phylick.

In it allo flood the chappell of Pannus, neer to the very river s built careely remain there any tokens thereof. This Fannus (as men say) was reported to have been the first that conserved chappels and temples to the gods, and for this cause, all such places conserved to the gods were called Fana. By the testimony of Cornelius Tacina; and Successions the statue of the emperor Inlins stood there.

CHAP. VII. The Senators bridg called also Palatine, and that which is named Sublicius.

Beneath the abovenamed Island, as it were a darte cast off, was the seventh bridg. Senatorum port, of the Senators, also Palatinas, of the mount Palatine neer adjoining: and at this day named it is the bridg of S. Mary in Seppe, by reason of S. Marying churchneer by.

Now followeth the last bring Sublicius, and which also is counted the most ancient of all of thers. This was first made of timber by Aneus Martius at the very foor of the Aventine mount. framed only with a short of planks without any iton spikes and nails or grops to shoat against it, so as in times of war and trouble it might be taken in pecess one from sunther. Now Sublicius was called a Sabliciu, i. great strong posts, But afterwards a Emplies Lepides made it of those, and thereupon named she matche bridg. Upon it in old sime last beggers exaving of alms of the passens. From it also lead and wisked madefactors, were thrown down, beadlong into Tyber. This brigd as well as other, was often demolished and built up again by ong or other.

Commonly alfo it is received, that Cacilius the Poet was under the fame hill Ianicalus buried. Martial the Poet, as himself witnesseth in his first book, had most pleasant and delectable hort-vards in the fame Laniculus.

CHAP. X.

The hill and field Vaticane, the semple of Apollo and Mars, the Nanmachie, the circuit bort-yards, and Obelisk of Calar.

"He mount Vaticane and the plain thereto, were without the City, 'in the parts beyond the I Tyber, and in that very place, where at this pay is the church of S. Peter, and the Popes palace. Called it was Varicanus, of the god Varicanus by whose infinit & inspiration it was believed in old time that prophefies were delivered. And this god they called Vaticonus, for that in power was the beginning of mans voice, for as much as infants, fo foon as ever they come into the world. presently pronounce and utter the first syllable of this gods name, i. * Va.

The temple of Apollo was in Vaticane, in that very place, as men think, whereon at this day is S. Petronoli or Parmels church, alfo another of Mars, wherein flandeth S. Maries in Febribus, aphence cometh on the postway called fometime Triumphalis, Gellins Writeth, that Inline Paulus the Poet had hortvards in the Vaticane. The vale Vaticane is there also to be feen, wherein Nero enclosed a compasse of ground like a ring for to ride and break horses in. The conventicles also and wine-taverns there he adorned, Moreover, Nero had hort-yards in that place, which he fet forth for divers and fundry punishments and tortures of Christians. All this place thus enclosed, he called the Cirque, Alfo the pools made for (hip-right, called Naumachia were there, and the Obelisk of Cafar in the Way Trinma phalis is yet to be feen franding upright. CHAP, XI.

The way or freet Triumphalis, the water Sabbatine, the fopulchre of Scipio.

F the Triumphall way, there bath been some mention made before, Called so it was, for that the folemh pomp of triumphuled to go that way up into the Capi tol. This as well as others was paved with flint itone. It went on ftill to the back porch of S. Celfut, towards the plain field of Flora; and to forward to the temple tometime of Jane, now'S. Angele, [and from thence to S. Georges church in Velabrum. In the pontifical hort-yards there be many antiquities found, brought thither from other places; and namely, the protraiture and counterfet of Nilas, also of al forts of creatures living and encreasing there. Likewife of Tiber, with the yeelding her tests to be fucked of the founders of Rome. Apollo with his bow and arrows ; the flatue of Laeccen, whereof hath been spoken before, Capit hard by Venus. Many other things before appear in the gallery, and those hort-yards.

The water Sabbatina, was derived to Rome from the Sabbatine pool, called Ang nillaria : and after wards when the conduct and conveighance thereof was by Hadrian reftored, it was brought into the palace of S. Peter, to ferve the priefts there;

In Vaticane plain, not far from the moune reared by Hadrian, there ftood a Pyramia or fteeple in times palt, under which they lay P. Serpie Africanus lay enterred.

A Elius Hadrianus reared a lunge and enighty arount for his own sepulchre neer the bridg Elius, overngainst the Mangolium of Angustus, in which were bestowed first his own others, and atterwards the relicks of all the Amounts. This is at this day the fort of the Popes. The fame also is called the tower of Crefentins, bezante one Crefeintine, a factions captain, held it a long time. Yee more in Procepins.

The meddows Quincia in the plain Facicanus, took the name of Quintins Cincinnains, Read Phiny hereof, Now they be called Aprata.

CHAP, XIII.

Of shele things which either have been, or remain now without the gate Flumentana.

"He first thing presented to our fight when we are out of the gate Finmentana is the port-way or causey Flaminia : which, as we have before shewed, was by Cn. Plaminius brought along as far as Ariminum. Within the City he paved it with flinter peble without he laid it with gravell. And in that order be all the port-water haid about Rome. Upon this way Angultus made four bridges, whereof at this day there remain scarcely any tokens. Neer unto the causey Cefer had a farm or manor house, which he called ad Gallinas. The reason of that name Live shewesh. To the way Flaminia, another named Claudia joined upon which were the Hort-yards of Ovid.

The way Emplia, made and paved by Lepidus the colleague of Flaminias, leadeth from Ariminum as far as Bononia. Now, two cauleies there were of that name, the one which met with Fla. minia: the other which Scaurus laid and made, which went through Pefe and Luna to the Sabatii. In likemaner there was a way called Tyberina and Caffia, without the gate now called Viridaria. which passed along time by Surrium, Tetrella, and Vitersiam into the way Vuline nits Certain places there be in the way Flaminia formewhat hollow and flat like faddles, called therfore Clitella.

CHAP. XIIII.

Of those things that are reported to have been without the gate Collons,

The port-way from the gate Collina is called Salaria, because the Sabines at it brought salt into the City. There upon flood the bridg Salarins, And it reached to Numentana, In it was the temple of Penns Erfeina, vowed by Fabins the Dictator, and dedicated by L. Portins. There flood the image of Venns Verticordia, to called for that the averted mens minds from wanton luft. Likewife the temple of Honor, and an altar in it. Finally, the monument or tomb of Licinius the barber of Augustus.

CHAP. XV.

The things that either were, or at this day are without the gates Numentana and Intraggeres,

Without the gate Numentana, there beginneth a canfey of the fame name, by which men goto Namennama. The fame is called Figulenfis, of the potters furnaces there flanding. The goddesse Nania, which was wont to wait & attend upon funerals with dolefull plaints and lamengoddeffes, which are inpposed to burt mankind, they erecked temples, but without the gate, because they should do the lesse harm and namely, to the Fever, to Marsthe revenger, to Nemels and namely of its fuch other. Upon this way Namentana there appeareth a most ancient temple of Bacchus about fortune and S. Agnes church, and over the same standeth the bridg Numentauns, built by one Narsets an En- floth. nuch. Between this way and Salaria, was a withdrawing house in the countrey of [Phanotus] Nerse freedman, in which Ners killed himself. Without the gate Interaggeres, was a tower or cafile called Cuffedia, where the fouldiers of Dioclefian kept a corps de guard. There also is a park called Vivarium (now Vivariolum) to be icen, where divers wild beafts were kept, more for plesfure and delight, then profit and ule.

CHAP.XVI. Of thefe things that without the gates Elquilina, Navis, Calimontans, and Gabiula, either bave been er now are Rom the gate Tibureina, there goeth a way of the fame name leading to the City Tybur. Up-tion it there is a bridg Mamant, commonly called Mamale, and bearing the name of Maman, A lexander the Emperours mother, who repaired it. A place, there is by it called Paticola, of a multitude of pits there. Allo the bridg Lucanau, without the laid gate flandeth over the river Anie. And without the same gate, the two tiveress called Anie the old and new do gather a current and runto Rome.

Without the gate Efauilme are waies Labicona and Pranefina. In this way the water Apple Windows the gate Espaisme, are water Louisme and Presspirate. In this way the water Apple hath his head and beginneth, which by Apple Clearium was brought into the City.

The water Kirge like white, which he time, galt was heaved by a maid to the fouldiers, is the way, and founthened is consigned to the City.

But the Roman waters fee Freezimas, who defertbeth right excellently, the fource and beginning the conveighance and carriage, the end allo and ufe of every one of them,

At the end of the way Calimontana, beginneth another called Campana, which closeth with Latina, the Between the gateCalimentana and Latina, ftandeth the gate Gabinfa. From which there went away fome time called Gabina, leading to Gabii (but it runneth foon into Prenefina for that the Gabians dwell apon it.

CHAP.XVII.

Of those things which were or are without the gates Latina and Capena

THe gate Latina gave both name and beginning to the causey Latina, which through Levice. uum, now called Val-montone, and Latium reachet hto Campaine, In which thereflood in old time, the temple of Womens-fortune, and the image of the same goddesse. Of which writeth Va. larius Max. In the faid way the water Topala gathereth to an head and current. From the gate Appla, beginneth a cauley of that name, paved by Ap. Glandins as far as to Capita, Whereof look

At the gate Capena, was the temple of Mars the warrior, or Grandious; and therein the fent. cheon of Mars. Hard by the same temple was the stone Manalie brought into the City of Rome in time of a drought, and presently there arose a showr of rain; whereupon he was called Ma. nalis. In the way Capena, stood the oratory or chappell of Dea bona: and neer to it, they fay, that Clodins and Papirins were flain. Neer to the gate Capena, was the altar of Apollo, the facred grove of Honour, and the temples of Hope and Mineron, Like wile of Tempef, built by Marcellus, Moreover, another of Ridiculum: becaule Annibal having there encamped, was enforced to depart from thence mocked and scorned. Upon the way Appia was the bridg Valentinus, built by the Emperor Valens, and thereupon, neer the hill Maffica, ftandeth the town Sinneffa.

This way had certain notable sepulchtes, namely of Collarinus, the Scipies, the Servilis, Metelli Tullis, of Ennius, Pompeius, the Horaris, and other. And in that part is to be feen the plain, where upon the Horatis fought that famous combat to the utterance. In it also there is a water and welfpring, confecrated to Mercurie. To it upon a time when the people of Rome ran, every man dipped therein his branch of laurell, and therewith besprinkled them that were next, with an invocation to Mercurie; that as many as had this afperfion and fprinkling, might be affoiled of their finnes, and of perjurie especially. The grove also of Egeria was this gate. The way Laurentina fell into Appia: wherein S. Sebaftian (by report) inffered even in the very place where they used to for lemnife the feast Terminalia, to the god of Meers and Bounds Terminus ly, two in number more accient then the other, choien by the people alone to second and to assist the Tribunes of the Commons as their right hands. This name they took of the charge they had of temples, chappels, and oratories; albeit they registered the San-Clions and acts of the people called Plebifeita and kept the fame in their own cultody; and were clarks of the market: also they exhibited the games and plaies called Plabeit. Carules, were likewise twain elected out of ed to fit, as officers of greater frate. They fet forth the great folemputes called Lade magni, or Remani; were overfeers of the buildings throughout the City as well publick as privat, in manner of the asympto in Afhent; they had regard to the Publick vaults, links, conveiances, and conduits of the City waters alooked to the Arienal &cc. Moreover, they had power to attach the bodies of great persons; and were charged to see unto the provision of corn and victuals. At the first, none but Patritii might be advanced to this place: but in process of time, Commoners

also attained thereunto. These as well as the Plebeis were Sacrofantti, i unviolable. Eraris, they were, who being citizens of Rome, were by the Ceniors deprived of giving their voices in their Century or Tribe ; paid all tribute with citizens according to the valuation of their goods and ferved in the wars of their own charges: and either because are pendebant. or, ara non merebant, it leemeth they took that name.

Agmen quadratum: Agmine quadrate duceresis raken in a three-fold sence. First, The same that infelto exercitu, infelto agmine, Ot, inf fis fignis: which fignifierly the ordinary manner of enemies marching with banners difformed; either to a battail. or to the fiege and affault of a fort; and this manner of phrase addeth a grace only to the fentence. Secondly, To march or fight in a four fquare battaillon, though not alwaies with equal fides & right angles: and the same nor charged with the carriages at all. Thirdly, When an army is foread and displaied at large, enclosing the impedimente or baggage in the mids, for fafety and security.

Agraria, were laws preferred by the Tribuns of the Commons, as well for division of lands (conquered from the enemies) among the Commons: as to restrainthe possessions of the Nobles within a certain, and com-

Ambinus, The inordinat and excessive defire to be in office of state, appearing by indirect and unlawfull means; either to their friends and kinsfolks, or to the people : against which, many laws in Rome were provided: namely, Acilia, Bahia, . Emylia, Licinia, and others.

Ancilia: Ancile was a buckler or foutcheon, that (as they fay) fell from heaven into the hands of K. Numain time of a plague : and he being advertised by Egeria, That it was for the health of the City and ought to be kept fafes caused it more to be made unto it, so like; as they could not be known from the pattern: which hereby was preferred. The keeping hereof was committed to the twelve

Annales, were brief memorials, Chronicles, or commentaries containing the names of confuls every year, the date of times, and all memorable occurrents hapning therein. The high Priests called Pontifices maximi, had the charge by their place to gather the lame into tables, and to let them up in their houses for to be feen: and herenpon they were called Annales maximi a Maximu Pontificibus; and not of their greatness, as those huge volumes. named Libri Elephantini.

pp. Appius, a forename appropriate to the House of the Claudii in Rome.

Appla via A notable ffreet or high-way; begun by Ap. Claudius, reaching from Rome, as far as Capua: and afterwards by Julius Cafar and Trajan, it was extended to Brindie in Calabria. Of all other it seemeth to be the principal, by the testimony of Papinins the Poet, who writeth thus of it:

Appa contarum fertur Regina viarum. Called it was Triumphalis (as also the gate Capena;) because through it the triumphs ordinarily passed at the said gate.

Aramaxima The great altar reased by Herens der, and took the name of a great heap of Ropes about it.

that naturally beareth no fruit.

Argilans imus, is the base or low part of a street in Rome; in regard of the upper end thereof, called Summus : in like fort as Janus Summus & imus.

Area, is taken for tome void place, whereupon nothing groweth quia aret as Forum boarium in Rome. Area qua posito de bove nomen kabet, and differeth from Campus, for that it is lefs. Alio a plot of ground made levell and clean for to build upon : as in Snetonius 26, Forum Cafar de manubiis inchoavit the Area wherof, (id eft, the trimming and levelling of the plot) coft H-S, millies, ed eft, 100 millions of Sestertii. Last of all the broad yards before temples, not covered but compaffed about with columns, like a cloifter with an altar in the mids, be called Area.

Arufbices, were wifards or fouth-fayers directed by the bowels and inwards of beafts killed for facrifice, called also Exespices, and in Greek iseg THO TOI, who prying into them, had especial regard of the liver; whereupon their whole Art and learning was termed in artooxonia, albeit they observed also the heart. lungs, ipleen, and kidnies.

As or Asis, usually in Livy is taken for a Roman poife, or coin in brass, the tenth part in value of their filver Denarius. At first it was a pound weight of twelve ounces; but afterwards, the Sextans, id eft, the fixt part therof, was valued worth the whole: and howfoever otherwise it altered in poise, it went alwaies for a farthings or thereabout of our english money.

Augurium' See Auspicia. Aurei Romani, Peeces of gold coin current in Rome: in round reckoning equivalent to our spur-roial of 15 sh. For 100 Sestertii made aureum, which amount to 15 fb. 7 d. ob. the 4 part of mina, i. a lib. in filver, and of an ounce of angel gold.

Austricia: Austrices were properly the observation of the birds, either by their singing and flying litthe air; or by their gef u e and manner of feeding in their caves or coup : whereby their Augurs & Pullarii knew in their learning, the pleasure and will of the gods, whether they favoured their enterprises or no. The birds that gave fign by their voice and finging they called Ofsines quafi one canentes, as the crow, raven, and owl; and therof came Augurium, quasi avium garritus. Those that shewed ought by their flight & wings, were named Alites or Prapetes, as the buzzard, eagle, crane; grype, fwan, and broad-winged fouls . marun segures, The good figns were called Sinistra auspicia quasi sinistima, quod sinant fieri. whether they came from the left hand or the right. In pullets or chickens kept in Cages, they observed whether they came forth willingly to their mear (for to abstain from it was thought unlucky) whereas their feeding heartily, was a good fign, and called Solistimum tripudium, quas terripavium & terrapidium. when some of the meat falleth out of the mouth, & serram pavit, i, beateth upon

Arbor infalix, Is commonly taken for a tree the ground ; as it must needs do, when they pecked either corn, or gobbets called offe. ាទាំវ ១០លោក 🚉 🕻

> T) Alifts, were certain wars-like engins for to Biend out and level mighty flones, to batter and shake City wals, made with ropes offinews and womens hair especially twined together: as appeareth by Vent & Calva at Rome. unto whom, by occasion that the women of the City parted with their hair for that purpole, a Temple was dedicated. According to the weight of stones or bullets that this engin would carry, they were called Centenaria, Or Talentaria balifta.

afilica, were stately edifices or halls at Rome: at first serving to plead in under covert, wherin they differed from Fora: and also to minifler justice, of Bariasis, which fignifieth a Judge, as well as a King : but afterwards they uied to meer there in consultation; also to negotiate and traffique: and these had not only benches and bars like law-courts, but fhops also for the better fort of wares and merchandile.

Bellona, The goddess of war; whose temple flood before the gate Carmentalis, and neer adjoining thereunto was a column named Bellica: from which the Romans were wone to lance a dart or javelin towards those parre where they intended to make war : whereas in former times they feur their heralds to the very confines of their enemies, to perform that ceremony.

Bigati, were the Roman Denarii, having the stamp of a chariot drawn with two horses. called Biga.

Baotarcha, The chief magistrats of the Boo-

C.Caius. > The forenames of fundry fa-Cn. Cneus, 5 milies in Rome.

Calends, was among the Romans, the day of the new Moon, which fell out with them ordinarily the first of every month : so named in Tor xansir, id eft, a calando, because the petry Pontity nied then to call the people to the court Calabra, and there to pronounce unto them how many daies were to the Nones of each month &c.

Candidati, were they that flood in election and fued for dignities of magistracy: during which time, they wore whiter and brighter gowns than ordinary that they might be the more easily seen and discerned a far off among Catapbracti, as well horse as foot, were they that were armed at al peeces with complear harnels : and such horsmen were named Defensores.

Catapules, were engine of war to shoot arrows or such like offensive weapons, far off: and by that name was called not only the inftrument it felf, but the arrow or whatfoever was thorout of it : as Turneb, weiteth in his 15 Adver (ar. cap. 1.

Cenfors, Magistrats of State in Rome: whose charge was to value and estimate mens goods, and enrol them accordingly in their feveral ranges. Also to demise unto certain Farmers; called Publicans, the publick profits of the City for a rent, and to put forth the City works unto them, to be undertaken at a price. Likewise to oversee mens manners, whereby oftentimes they would deprive Senators of their dignity, take from gentlemen their horses of service and their rings; displace Commoners out of their own tribe, difable them for giving voices, and make them Erarii.

Centuries, were ranges and degrees of men according to their worth, as they were affeffed and enrolled by the Cenfors.

Centuriata comitia, were those assemblies and elections, wherein the people of Rome gave their voices and fuffrages, according to their behaviour & wealth, by Centuries, And inch were at all times most favourable to the no-

Circenses ludi (as one would fay) Circu-enfes. For in the beginning before the great lifts and shew-places (called Cirques) were built, the plot of ground wherein were performed the horse-runnings and other masteries, was flanked of the one fide with the river, and environed on the other with fwords. Vide Turneb. Adversar. lib.3. cap.5.

Cistophorus, A peece of alver coin in Greece and those parts neer adjoyning, less than Drachma or Denarius : fo called of the stamp, representing a man carrying a panier or casket with holy reliques, in Cybeles mysteries, in Bacchi orgiu, or Cereris imisis. If it be true. that 7500 of them go to the Euboick talent, which containeth 4000 Denarit, it is just our groat ferling: but if Denarius have preportionem sesquiquartam to it, and that 4 Denaris are 5 Cistophors, (as Glarean collecteth out of Budene) it cometh to our teston of 6

Cleacina, supposed to be the image of Venue, found by K, Tation in the great vault or fink conveighed under the city, called Closes maxima. And for that it was not known what goddels it resembled, he gave it the name of that place. Others fay, it is written Cluacina of the old word Clua (to fight:) for that the Romans and Sabins (ready to firike a battail) were by means of myrtle branches confecrated unto Venus, pacified and reconciled, in that very place where afterwards the laid goddels was by that name worthin-

Coemptionalis fenex, Paulus Manutius upon the familiar Epithies of Cicero, giveth this attribute to Scapeius in the end of the third book of Livy, wherean in all editions it is, Concionalis. Now the fo Coemptionales fenes (faith he) were those old men, in whose cuition and authority, men by their last will and testament left their widows or daughters ; and without whom they might not pais in Dominium viranne per coemptionem, i. be matried according to the ceremony called Coemption, whereby the husband and wife feemed to buy one another.

Cobort, was ordinarily a band of 500 fouldiers; although once or twice in Livy we read of Quadragenaria cohortes.

Comitimes, was a publick place or Hall within the Forum Romanum, where the people used to affemble for audience of justice, pleading of causes, and other occasions: whereupon Comitiales dies, were such daies upon the which they might to affemble and meet to-

Comitia. or Comices, were the folemn affemblies of the people at Rome, fummoned by the magiffrats lawfully; to choose officers, to enact new law's or cancel old, by their voices: wherof were three forts.

Curiata, inflicuted by Romulus. Centuriata, by S. Tullius. Tributa, brought in by the Tribuns of the people: and the first author thereof Was P. Voliro.

Curiata and Centuriata, were Aufricata,i. performed with the folemnity of observing the approbation of the birds, and the Senators.

Tributa, were held by the Commons only, penes ques non erant anspicia, and required neither Auspicia nor authoritatem, the allowance of the Patres. And as in Comities Centuriatie, the richer and greater men had the vantage; fo in Curiata and Tributa, the poorer fort (for their number) went away with the better.

In the Cursata comitia, at the first (until S. Tullius his reign) palled the election of KK, and other magistrats, judgements in capital matters, and laws. But in later times, they ferved only for two laws: i de imperio, or de re militarium; in which the conful or others (chosento their magistracy in Conturiatis comitiis) had authority of command in the army : the other, de adoptione ; and these laws were called Cariate.

In the Centuriata comitia, from the time of Ser. Telling, passed the elections of consult, Decemvirs, Tribuns consular, Censors, Pretors, and fuch greater magistrats; and confirmed they were by Curiaia. Alfo, judgment of capital matters, & the laws named Centuriate. In this, there was one centurie drawn forth by lot one of all the reft to give their voices first, and that was called Prarogativa. After which were called to their fuffrages, the Centuries of the first and second Classis, and they were named Prime-vocata: the rest which followed, were called Inre-vecata.

Tribma lerved for the creation of Tribuns, Ediles of the Commons, and other inferior magistrats. Also the laws as rouching peace, or enfranchifing allies, judgments penal and fines, and those ordinances concerning the good of the Commons, called Plebifcita.

Some have thought amils, and Current a and Tributa comitia, were both one : but Curiata were more ancient, and of greater flate as Eccee 2 degree, age, and ability in the Cenfors book. Congins, or Chus, A measure among the Romans containing 6 Sextarii, and every Sextarius about 20 ounces : fo that Congins receiveth X. librales menfuras; as appeareth by the old ponttraich thereof in brafs, with these two characters, X.P. i. ten pound. Whereby in round reckoning it may go for our wine gallon or fomewhat better. And for that great persons were wont at first to give dole unto the common people, of wine or oil by the Congii: all other donatives and largefles of that kind, were afterwards called Congiaria.

Conf I one of the foveraign yeerly magistrats in Rome, succeeding in the place of KK. so named, a Confalendo cither of asking counsel of the people and Senate in State matters, and withal giving his own advice and providing for the good of the weal-publick : or elfe, of judging, for fo Consulere fignifieth; as when we fay boni consulere. And Live faith, that Pretores, Confules, and Judices, may be taken one for another. Two of them were utually chosen every year as appeareth by the law of the 12 Tables : Regio imperio duo funto : iique presundo, Judicando Consulendo, Pratores, Judices, Consules appellantor, &c.

Corona, hath divers fignifications in Livy. Corona wrbem cingere,i. to invest a City round about with armed men, and to give the assault from all parts at once. Sub corona vendere servos, i. to tell flaves in open market, either having garlands on their heads, as the manner was; or environed about with a guard of fouldiers, which also is called Corona militum. Sundry garlands or chaplets there were moreover called Corona wherwith fouldiers were rewarded by their captains or they honored by their fouldiers: (besides those that were presented to Generals by their friends and well-willers, or offered to the honour of the gods:) as Oblidionalis of Gramines, which was a wreath of a cuich grass called Gramen, given to him that delivered an army from freight fieges, and was by the whole army bestowed upon that savior. Civica, made of oke branches for him that in battel faved the life of his fellow citizen. Maralis, refembled the battlements of walls; which he received of his captain, that first scaled the walls and mounted over in the affault of cities. Caftrenfis, in form of a pallaitade or rampier made with pales or firong flakes: the honor of him who first entred the enemies camp. Navalis or Roftrata, pourtraied with the flems or beak heads of ships called Rostra; his reward that first boorded the enemies ship, and gave the first means of a naval victory: These were the principal. For, others there were not fo ordinary, as namely, Explorators garnished and fet out with the fun, moon, and other flars; bestowed upon them that did special fervice in espial and discovery of the enemies quarters,

Curia, were parishes in Rome, 30 in number inflituted by Romalus. Certain halls befides topointed for affemblies and convocations as bout Church matters and Religion: whereof fome were old, called fimply Veteres; others new, named Nova. As for Curia Hoftilia it was the ordinary ancient place of publick counsel within Rome.

Curio, the Priest belonging to each Curio or parish aforesaid : and Curio Max. the chief inperintendent over them all.

Decius, a forename: for Decius, although it were the gentile name of a house, grew afterwards to be a forename, as Paulus : and likewise forenames at the first, came to name families, as Postbumius.

D. Decimus, a forename likewise, as of that Brutus furnamed Albinus, who killed Cafer Decemviri, were magistrats, officers, or fellowships, ten in number.

Decemvirs leosbus scribendis were ten men chofen to make laws in Rome: who afterwards usurped the soveraign authority, and tyrannized.

Decemviri facrorum, were certain Priefts, who had the keeping and perufing of Sibyls books of deftinies, and thereout gave order for facrifices and expiation of prodigies, Decembers ; ten Judges or ministers of Judice, selected out of the great court or counsel of the 100 Centumvirs, and they were called, Decemviri de litibus judicandis: affiftant they were to the Pretor or Lichief justice.

Dettator, a foveraign magistrat above all others in Rome, from whom no appeal was granted, mere absolute and King-like: but that his time of rule was limited within fix months ordinarily: so named, either because be only said the word and it was done, or because he was Dictus, i. nominated only by one of the Confuls, and not otherwise chosen, usually in some time of great danger of the state. He was called also Freser Maximus: and namely, when he was made for the ceremony of striking up or driving a nail: also Magister Populi, as Cicero 3 de fin. Moreover, he was fometimes appointed to ordain and hold folemn feasts, in regard that it had rained ftones.

Duumvirs, magistrats two in number, of divers forts.

Dummviri capitales, judges to fit upon life and death: from whom it was lawfull to appeal to the people.

Dummviri facrorum, out of the Patritians, ordained for dedication of temple, preparing the facred beds for the gods, called Lesifternia; and for the books of Sibylla: thele afterwards were increased to five, and so to ten. See Decemviri.

The feword Index.

Dunmviri Navales, two wardens of the navy, ports, and fea-coaffe.

Pulones, were certain Priests whose office was to prepare and fet ont the folemn feat for Jupiter called Eputum, and for other gods. Of them were three, called Triumviri Epulones, and after feven, Septemours Epulones.

L'Eciales were the Heralds : of whom these was a colledge of 20, the principal of them was Paterpatratus, as it were their Dean, And according to Platarch, he ought to be a man that had children of his own, and his father living; for having the charge of making peace and alliances, it behaved that he should be a perion accomplished, and as well to look before as behind due mesone in onione, to regard what is palt and what is to come : the one was fignified by his father, the other by his children.

Fafti fignifieth sometimes feftas diesei, holidaies: and in that sence Quid ensituleth his books Fasti, wherein he setteth down the ordinary fealts of every month. two, and half the third: and therefore you fee the numeral note of two, and S. for femis, which is half. It is the fourth part of the Roman Denarine, and in value among us is three half pence farthing cve. But Seffertiam in the neuter gender, betokeneth aimuch as mille Sefteries, i. a thonfand Sefferces, forhat decem Seffertia fignifieth ten thousand Seflerisis and decem Sefterioum is as much ; for you must in this maner of speech understand millia for the regimen of the Genitive cafe. But if you add unto Seffertium the numeral adverbait sheweth the same Sefteris minthe neuter abovesaid multiplied a hundred times fo much as the faid numeral beareth. For example, decies Seftertium, is decem Sestertium, a hundred times told, and as much to fav as decies centena millia Se ftertium, which is a million of Sefferces in the primitive fignification: whereby a man may foon reckon how much is millies Seftertium and the reft either under or over decies. The fame is to be faid of Numus and Number, for it is the fame that Sefferting and Seffertium, Moreover. decies, mellies, and fuch like adverbs whether you put Namam or Seftertium thereto, or no, is all one: fo that by this form of speaking, ejes bona fe erunt vicies, is meant thus, his goods amounted unto two millions of Sefterce peeces. Lettus is usually to be understood in Livy for the bed whereupon they laid themselves at eafe when they took their refection and Triclinium is taken for Conclave, i. the parlor where they were wont to iup, because the usual manner was to set three such beds or pallets together: (whereof the room had the name)and a table raised somwhat higher from the floor, and placed so, as it served all three pallets, and was open at one fide for the fervitors to come unto it, and either fet meat thereupon or to minister what was called for. Upon each of these beds there sate or leaned ordinarily three persons: so as nine was the full number of guests at the boord, according to the rule, No fewer than the grages, nor more than the mules, For Horace in this yerle, Sage tribus lettis vides country quaternos, feemeth to glance at the niggardife of that would tather want meat than guelts, and to let twelve at the table which was but for nine, whereby also they were pent up together too fireight.

Rudera, Cum milites religione tacti rudera jacerent. To make tente of this place, I have translated Rudera, peeces of brass mony : for that I cannot fee what should be meant by rubbish stone in that place, which was not demolished by Annibal, for anything that I can find; but only robbed of the filver & gold within the chappel of Feronia: in stead wherof were found aris acervi: by reason that the fouldiers, who had some sence of religion & touch of conscience (whereof their leader Annibal had never any) cast from them [Rudera. Now probable it is that Radera, is corruptly put for erathe later end of the word: or if we admit Rudera: it is well known that Rudsu as well as as fignifierh brais and brafen mony, as appeareth by Rudusculum the di-minutive: for as of as came Esculum, so of Rudus (no doubt) Rudusor lumi and like as of Asoulum, Esculanus, a god of the Paintins, father of Argentinus (because copper & brais mony was before filver coin:) fo of Rudu feulums the gate Rudufouland in Rome, fet out with brais. Now that Rudafculum is put for a small peece of brais coin, it is proved by the form of words in buying and felling, and in manumifion (Rudy Calo libram ferito) which is all one with are Libram percute or feri. By which I collect that Rudera in this place may fland for ara, i peeces of coin. For there went afore, ares acerus, which Horace putteth for heaps of brais mony, and not for braien images. And well it may be, that the fouldiers upon some devetion, threw into the Church their oblations of fuch mony as they had in their belts or bandoliers. This conjecture & confiruction of mine may ferve, untill fomewhat here may be made of rubbish stone, or better exposition come in place. The word (I am fore will hear it, and the context in all fence and congruity, doth require it.

CHRISTINA.

By the Grace of God Queen of the SWEDES, GOTHS, VANDALS and the adjoyning Provinces.

T hath happily faln out, that your wonderful Humanity and Learning , rarely to be found in fo great a Majesty, have given me ad-Vantage of omitting one of those two Jubjects which usually are the Contents of Dedicatory Epiftles. For I have so many reasons to declare why I present this Supplement to your Majesty, that if I were forced likewife to declare the Argument of the Work, to what End, and in what Manner it is contrived. I could not accomplish it without a long and tedious Epistle. But now those Your two Virtues Imentioned, have freed me of this Necessity, seeing out of your Humanity you condescended to read the Work while it was in Composing, and by your Learning more fully understood, then I or any other could expound what was superfluous, and what wanting in it. I will not therefore accuse the meanesse of my Wit or Learning, or any other thing, that this my Defign hath no more happily succeeded, (Let those men pretend shortnesse of time, multitude of businesse or incommodities of sicknesses, who aim at other Glory besides that of Obedience) it sufficeth me, I am conscious, that in writing this, I have observed the benefit of your Studies, and in making it

Publick been Obedient to Your Will. For when in compiling the Relicks of Lx vx's HISTORY which at that time you diligently read, I had finished this Work as a Bridge over a broken Passage, Youwere pleased (according to Your excellent and well known Goodnesse) to expresse Your liking of my Endeavors; and, as Your Self thereby had reaped Benefit, so to judg them fit of Publick View, that others might likewise be profited by them. Wherein You manifested both your Wisdome and your Bounty: Your Bounty, in that what was folely intended for your own fervice, you were willing should be useful unto all: Your Wisdom in that, in this new beginning and encrease of Learning, which by your example and Help the North doth greedily receive and happily improve, you have encouraged other men to exercise their Wit and Industry in publishing more Accurate and Learned Writings, when they shall have understood with how much Candor and Clemency You accept this rude and unpolished Piece of mine. When therefore I see not only those who are born unto your service, but many also of strange Nations most willingly entertain and execute your Commands: Should I at all be back. ward in my Duty, Toho, if not alone, yet among ft a few of your most Faithful and nearest subjects, am in a peculiar manner obliged by your Majesty? The Epistle Dedicatory.

who created all things, neither from any other do I expect a True and Lasting Felicity. neither do I bear a mind inferior to so great a Hope: But as to the Offices of this Life I am by him bestowed upon your Majesty, as by infallible Arguments, to your felf not unknown, may be demonstrated. Wherefore my constant and resolved Rule of living (which, if I attain not unto, as I am willing and ought to do, yet I aim at and endeavour) is to attends God's will only in those things which are expressly commanded or forbidden : in Actions indifferent and arbitrary to be guided by your Majestie alone. which I the rather strive to perform, because I know it is your Pleasure. And truly this were a sufficient tie of my Obedience and Reverence, if you had not otherwise both by your Virtues and Deferts obliged me, both which are so ample and of so effectival an Influence, that it is hard to fay whether in Contemplation of them I am more willing to ferve you, or for other Reasons more strictly bound to it. I find my self now involved in a very doubtful (afe, and on both fides much perplexed: For if I fay what I have intended, as my defire is, and as is fuft and Right, I may happin not be relished by your Majestie, who do more freely exercise your Virtues, and fasten your Favours then willingly hear them repeated. And if in the Mention thereof I shall omit any thing, I shall fail in my Duty, and Detract from Your Praises, which (with as fervent a defire and good will as I projecute them) had I liberty to expatiate, I could in no wife according to their Dignity set forth, much less being streightned within the narrow limits of an Epiftle. Nevertheless I am confident, that the Temper of the business (which your self cannot disallow) is agreeable, as to the present purpose, so to both our Dispositions. For I abhor Flattery as doth your Majestie; neither am I more willing to speak any thing in such a strain, then Your self to hear it. And, according to your discerning Spirit, you are not ignorant that I am of this mind, that if it were in my choice whether to offend You in doing You Good, or please You by Flattery, I should without scruple chuse the former, which few Subjects can do and few Princes sendure. Hinder not therefore my defires which cannot offend on that part: Give us leave to acknowledge what we have received: and if miserable men are freely allowed to complain, why should your Majestie forbid us modestly to boast of our Happinesse under such a Prince as Your self? Neither ought this, the only Reward of your good Deeds, or the Fruit of our Thankfulness to perish ; we then again a fresh receive benefits when we repeat them. But I fee what is happened, whileft I beg leave to Write I loofe both Time and Space. What therefore I am about to Jay, shall be into a few Periods digested, and I shall of every kind speak somewhat only in Summe. As to those your Virtues wherewith you have magnificently Adorned this Empire; that I may briefly declare what I think, I shall borrow a Sentence from our beloved Tacitus; in which Author, You know, Tiberius reproacheth C. Cæsar, That he had all the Vices of L. Sylla, but not so much as one of his Virtues: which may justly be inverted as to Your Majestie, that You have acquired all the Virtues of Your Predecessors, omitting what Vices were in them, infomuch as You have augmented their Ancient Honours by Virtues new and heretofore unknown to this Kingdom. I believe that former Ages wanted not excellent Kings, yet, however it came to pass, the Swetick affairs never ascended to any illustrious or durable greatness in their dayes; the Praise of that work properly belongs to the Gustavides, of whom not any one ever Reigned Without some Memorable profit to the Countrie: for even the Error of some have proved of good use; the Case of Ericus and Sigismund instructeth Posterity wherein Kings may offend: and others are admonished by the severity of Charles, how unsafe it is to provoke Princes to Anger. But what Pen or what Oration can sufficiently declare the Immortal benefits reaped from the two Gustavi? They were both so great, that if you compare them with others, you will easily prefer them before others; but if you compare them between themselves, you will rather conclude that this was Greatest and the other Greatest, then discerne which of the two excelled. For it is a great Error and blindnesse of judgment to measure the Greatnesse of Kings by the outward Splendor of their Actions, and respect that only.

It happens often to these Stars on Earth as to those in Heaven, that some indeed are the greater though others seem to be so. But this is manifest, that God had Ordained by two Princes especially to advance the glorie of this Kingdom, even by Gustavus the Great, and his Daughter CHRISTINA. He indeed was the more endowed with Warlike Virtues, yet so as when he had leisure from the Field, he did most Accurately and Skilfully manage affairs at Home: God having referved Your selfe. Madam, to a greater work, the Recoverie, Establishment and Ornament of Peace, bath every way accomplished You for so great a Task; yet so, as while there was a necessitie of War. You could not complain of any thing wanting in Your self to the highest Praise in such an Employment. For whereas little is to be attributed to bodily exercife, You were found eminent in all those Virtues of the Mind which are required in the best Emperors, as Counsel in Perlexities, Constancy in Adversity, Moderation in Prosperity, Diligence, Wisdom, Faithfulness in all things; whereby after many and famous Vi-Stories, You concluded Peace with Denmark in the first year of your Reigne, and in the fourth year a most glorious and advantageous one with the German Emperor. Which peace how and by what means you have adorned, I cannot in this Hast declare; I shall only name the encrease of the City, many Towns built and well constituted, Justice established, the People eased in their Taxes, Manners amended, the Honor and Reward of Learning encreased, the Universities enriched, Schools erected, Merchandize flourishing many Manufactures newly invented, the Ground manured beyond the simplicity of the Ancients; your care and diligence adhibited toward the Commodity of Travel, measuring of High-wayes, building of Inns, and indeed toward all things which we fee, which we are sensible of, and the benefit whereof we enjoy; so that I may justly account those my Countrymen of Germany happy who shal hereafetr rest under your Protection: whom I would have with my felf and all other Your Subjects, think no fign furer of God's Anger or Favour toward them, then as he shall long preserve, or suddenly take away such a Prince from amongst them. If there be any who dare not lift up their Eys by reason of the misery of times past, or are so hindred by the Interposition of clouds that they could not hitherto behold this Bright Star, be comforted with its Aspect, and refreshed with its Heat: They may justly be encouraged to expect all things happy and prosperous near at hand, not only by the greatnesse of so Benigne and Favourable a Light, but also by the Constancy thereof. For the Splendor of it is not derived, as that of a Candle or Torch, which failing, the remaining substance appears fouler; but like that of the Sun, True, and Pure, and Innate, neither to be consumed by Time, or extinguished by Violence: which now shineth openly to those who dwell afar off, and will so dispell all Clouds from before their Eyes, that you shall find none so blind as cannot see it, or impudently injurious to their own judgments as to denie they see it. But though it be troublesome to me to draw my mind from this sweet and pleasing Contemplation, I shall not endeavour to comprebend the mention of these Virtues within the narrow Limits of this Paper, this Time, or this my little Wit, which ought in whole Volumes to be declared to all Nations and Ages. I shall make bold to be more Prolixe in the Commemoration of your benefits bestowed on me, as being not so well known to the World, and more properly belonging to the Caufes of this Dedication, as likewife not unworthy Monuments of your Virtues. But I must first acknowledge the Providence of God which I have alwaies found most manifestly present in this dufinesse. When for many years in Germany I continued in such a condition of life (for many reasons thereunto personading me) as not resolutely addicted to any particular Profession, yet ready to accept of any which should lawfully offer it felf: in all that while no man determined my liberty with obligation to any calling. In the mean time I spent not that my leisure in idlensse, but bestowed it in those Studies to the which (by what afterward hapned, I evidently understood) I was from my infancie ordained. The time now grew on, Madam, wherein I was to be dedicated to Your Majesties Service, and Benedict Skytte came to Argentoratus, whom Your Majestie hath deservedly honoured with many Favors, and lastly with the Dignitie of a Senator. By him invited I came to Your Universitie, where instructing the Youth with care and diligence, though I had an earnest desire to see Your Majestie, yet I preferred the necessitie of my present Office, before the sweetnesse of an happinesse not yet due to me. When I had now three years been debarred of any Conference with your Majestie, having lately taken upon Your Self the Administration of Your Realm, upon occasion of a Funeral You came to Ubsal. And from that time I shall begin the Commemoration of Your Fayours towards me. The last Office of Love was then performed to my Patron Iohn Skytte Senator, whose praises according to the Dutie of my Place, I endeavoured to set forth in a Funeral Oration; and this was the first Speech I made in Your hearing; But when by the cheerfulness of your most Serene Countenance You discovered both Your understanding of what was spoken, and Your Favour to the Speaker, I was so infinitely possessed with Pleasure and Admiration, that thenceforward I resolved to esteem You not only as a Queen of Me and Your Kingdomes, but Princesse of all Virtues and Wisdom. The same Favour I received two years after, when as often as you came to Ubsal, you heard my Discourses upon any Subject you propounded. Intending afterward to accumulate more Favours upon me. You invited me to Court, not only beyond my Hope, but besides my Thoughts of any such thing: what You there bestowed upon me, can scarce by a long Oration be declared: You made me Keeper of Your Librarie, then which I know none fo foon after its first beginning, more plentiful in Books, which hath been a main help to me in Compiling this Supplement. You gave me the Title of your Historiographer. that when you should think fit I might deliver to Posterity the Memory of things done or to be transacted. You afforded me Lodging in your Court, not only very convenient, but (which is rarely found in so frequented a Place) very private and quiet also, and a Stipend, which by experience I have found, very subject to Envy. And whereas these may be esteemed Favours of the highest rank, you have, by what after sollowed, caused them to be esteemed small ones: For when you defired the Knowledge of the Greek Tongue, that you might from their own Mouths understand the sense of the most excellent writers in Civil and Moral VV isdom, you did so by degrees induce me to the Office of your Instructor therein being ignorant of your Purpose that at length I understood I had taught much indeed, when on the sudden I found you had Learnt so much. By this your Art in that small time you could allow out of two years to such a Study (being a Queen actually Reigning, waging VVar, often holding Parliaments, every day Councels, and constantly distracted with other business you made such an improvement that after Trial in Polybius and Plutarch, you read Plato also, and that with such understanding, that fignificant Expressions, and of Your self observe and for true reasons Correct the Error of Translations made with the great pains of Learned men. Whereby I reaped fo great and various fruits of purest pleasure, as I could not but often ingenuously confesse to my most intimate acquaintance. That whatsoever Time, or Labour, or Study, or Care 1 bestowed in this employment (for Trouble, I call my Conscience to witnesse, I never felt any) I thought all abundantly recompensed with that reward I could every hour receive from you. For to omit other benefits, what an advantage was even in this, to be every day in the presence of so great a Prince, to be seen and countenanced by You to obtain the Title. Place and Honour of a Favourite? Truly my Happinesse seemed so great to me, that I began to be afraid of it. For though, by the Grace of God, I ever put off these my worldly Accountements, as knowing I must one day leave them or they me, yet out of impotency of mind I might by too great happiness have grown insolent, but that by certain Arguments I learnt in time to know that so great a fortune was not conferred as Due to any man's Merits, but as the free gift of your Grace and good will. And in this fo high and great an Happinesse there are many excellent Circumstances particularly confiderable, I am tied only to my own Vocation, employed only in mine own Studies, that is I am so free that I am not employed and wearied in any service not proper to my own Office and calling. Neither have you a care of my Time and Health only, but also of my Modesty and Bashfulnesse: I appear not but at the time of your Studies, neither then do I break in without command, to stand as an idle and dumb Spectator, vainly looking time. or boldly vaunting of my Liberty and Familiarity. Neither is my work base or vile, we do nothing which requires either Secrecy or Excuse: whosoever will not betray his own ignorance must needs confesse the employment on my part worthy of a man, on yours becoming a Prince. Hitherto I have related part of the Favours you have besto wed on my Person: it remains likewise I should acknowledge those Favours (as much more bestowed on me) which you have conferred on others by my Intercession : In which confession I have cause to fear, that I shall not only contract Envy to my selfe, but give Occasion to others to accuse your Majestie, as being two Facile in granting what is requested. To these I shall answer, That I do indeed acknowledge and admire your Goodnesse which bath far exceeded my Deferts, and that others also may obtain equal or greater Favours if they ask them with the same Respect that I have done: as first, I never desired any thing but what was Just and Equal: nor secondly, any thing misbecoming the Office and Majestie of my Prince; thirdly, by all those Boons I have obtained for others, I know not that I am a penny the richer. But in this strait, wherein it is easier to think of more things then to write them, many things come into my mind which I am forced to pretermit. This I shall fay, I am in doubt whether I am more beholding to your Majestie for small favors bestowed at my Request, or for the great ones; for as these carried the greater Price the others did more manifest your Humanitie. That your mind capable of highest things would condescend to so little ones. We Read of a King, who when a Phylosopher asked of him a Groat, faid. It was too little for a King to give; when he presently asked a Talent, said, It was too much for a Phylosopher to receive. Your Majestie hath more magnificently used the same Method, in Your smaller favours, regarding what was fit for me to receive; in the greater, what became Your felf to give. With the like Clemency You have had compassion on some miserable men (whom I therefore commended to Your Majestie because none had pity on them) and done that which I dare yet scarce speak, both for the Greatnesse of the Thing, and for the Greatnesse of the Thanks due, which cannot at present be expressed. But I may bapply be accused of Folly that I should think your favours may be more Elegantly declared or praised by any man's Oration then by your own Deeds and Works; or that I should think you stand in need of my Commendation for having bountifully remitted to the City of the Vangiones the greater part of their Taxes, by which benefit I believe the City was preserved, and shall do well and justly if they honour your Majestie as a second Foundress; You have hereby for ever oblined the Commonwealth of the Vangiones, and me in particular, making us your everlasting Debtors. For I know not who of Right oweth most to you, they who received the benefit or he who procured it at your Hands. Is there any thing can be equalled to . or preferred before what I have already faid? Yes furely, even this, In that you have promiled to make me a better man, not, as all men are improved, by Laws and Manners, nor as many, by Example, but, as yet none, by Your care and Diligence in Conversing with me: For you have promifed to make Enquiry with me (that is to direct and thew me) how Wife and Prudent men ought to be qualified, and by what fignes they may be difcowered: which when I have learned, I make no question of being much better then now I am. And I so much value this your Promise, that I would not free your Majestie from your Obligation for half your Kingdom: And I frall not refuse, whensever You Command, to declare the Reasons of this my Resolution. And to perform this, will. I suppose, be neither unpleasant to You, nor yet Difficult, seeing You tend forward to the height of that Wisdom, which even among the Learned you shall find more who pretend to teach then do indeed truly know Gunderstand it. In this thing I may wel boast whereby I am more happy, not only then ordinary men, but the fervants of Solomon himself, who are justly esteemed happy in having opportunity of hearing his Wisdom, but would have been much more happy if he had taken peculiar Care to have instructed them in his own Person which we read not be ever did. But I perceive that contrary to my will and the nature of my Argument, the very Paper admonisheth me to make an ends I shall therefore now be filent, humbly adoring your Majestie, and giving You to understand. That not only this Book is Dedicated to Your Majestie, but my whole self with all my Soul and the Affection ons thereof, with what I am, or have, or can do, being for Your fake simply willing to do any thing what soever without exception, unless what is against Conscience, or beyond my Abilities to perform.

THE FIRST BOOK

In place of LIVIE'S XI Book.

Collected out of Authors whose Names are in the Margin annexed.

HE Power of the Samnites was now by many Battels much broken, neither was any doubt made of happily finishing the War, in case the Enemy in this low and weak condition were prevented of time sufficient to recollect and firengthen his spirits. Therefore 2. Fabisat the Conful, In the year now in the heat of his Youth, and affuring himself the glory of putting from the sound an end to this War, having made a sudden levy, marcheth incontication of the sum of the

Fear, while the former Confuls carried back the Legions to Rome attending on their Tritimph, laid hold on that opportunity, and what with the Relicks of their former Armies, and fome new Levies, had gathered together a confiderable force, and because they knew the Plague was at Rome, and had heard that the present Confuls were men not much to be feared, either forang experience in Marshal affair. or for any great Authority they had, they grew consident, invaded, depopulated, and wasted the Territories of the Campanians whom Livis Book 7 they had alwayes hated, but now more vehemently, looking on them as the Authors of the dan-ch.31 gers and calamities they now single the dignity of his Fabion-Family, but the small account he made of a Nation so often beaten 2 and 2 and 10 counties and Deliberation. He marchests swiftly towards the enemy, and having discovered the Samnite stouts, who upon sight of the Roman troops retired back to their own main Body, and judging this to be a flight of the whole Holf, without any consideration had either of the place or the condition of his men, he commands in all haft that may be the Battel to be begun, as if the hope of Victory consisted only in Expedition: But the Samnites having notice of their approach, were very circumspect, had seized on advantageous places, marshalled their Army, and invensed the minds of their Souldiery with their commanders Orations; and consequently the Event of the Battel was accordingly; for the Samnites being in good Rank, and well prepared, made no great business to rout the Romans, being very weary with their journey and surious march, out of all order, as if they came rather to plunder then to sight. Three Europius Batton shared, out of all order, as if they came rather to plunder then to sight. Three Europius Batton shared, out of all order, as if they came rather to plunder then to sight. Three Europius Batton shared his men were lost, a greater number wounded, and only by the benefit of Suids in Esi, the Night was the total destruction of his

So that the whole night was passed away with the Groans of the dying, and the Complaints of the living, every one with horror and despair waiting for the next day as their last. For being tired with labour, diftempered with long watchings, weakned with wounds, terrified with an unlucky overthrow, and their number much diminished, they thought it impossible to refift the enemy, whom when they were found and entire both in body and mind, and filled with hopes of Victory, they were not able to encounter upon even terms. Things being at this ill paffe the Remedy (as it often happens) proceeded from the enemies mistake, who daunted with the Rumour of the other Conful's approach, and fearing left while he affaulted Fabius his Camp, the new forces would furround him, contented himself with what successe he had above his hope obtained, and diverted his course another way. The Enemy being removed, the Romanslikewife betook themselves to a safer Resuge: when these tidings were brought to Rome, the City was exceedingly moved, not so much with the losse, as the dilgrace of the business, and took it deeply to heart, That the longest war they were ever troubled with, when it was now just at a period. should by the rashness of one Consul be revived again, and that more formidably then before, by reason of the great hopes and confidence which the Samnites would assume in contemplation of this their fuccels. Neither was this the sense of the Tribunes of people alone. whose proper art it was by their frequent Orations to fill the Citizens minds with envy and hatred, but even the Fathers, upon discuss of the business, pronounced very heavy and severe sentences, and a Decree was made by the Senate, That Fabius the Conful should be commanded at a Dio apud Vale- certain day appointed to come and plead his cause at Rome. He was no sooner at Rome, but a fwarm of accusers flew about him; and indeed the fault could not be excused, and what was only left of moment on his behalf, even the efteem of old Fabins, was made use of as an argument against him; for they thought him least of all men to be pardoned, who being extracted from fo Illustrious a Parent, and brought up in the midst of his Fathers triumphs, had, by his Imprudence with so foul an overthrow, cast a stain not only on the Roman Glory, but on the renown of his own Family, and the many victories of his Ancestors obtained. Their minds being thus exasperated (that it was not likly the Desendant should have a fair hearing) were first by the consideration of his Fathers eminent Piety, and afterward with his Oration totally appealed. For he fearing leaft for this milcarriage his person would be removed from his Command, infifted not at all in excusing the Crime, but modefuly recounting his own and his forefathers merits, defired there might not be in his old age fo ignominious a Character imprinted on the Fabian Family: Neither did he require that for the fake of fo many other Fabii, who 'almost from the foundation of the City, had by their virtue and counsel augmented the Roman * Empire ; nor that for the fake of those three hundred Fabii, who by their own deaths, and · almost the total loss of the Fabian Name, had protected the Commonwealth, the error of one fingle person should be forgiven, if it were found remediles, and that a greater commodity would accrue from the punishment then the preservation of his son. But whatsoever was in this young man to be feared, is already come to pals, whereas unless we cut off our own hopes, I cannot fay by an unjust, but by an untimely severity. Those many good deeds which his spirit and lively Genius, which likewise his virtue (by me, in your esteem, none of the worst Tutors, being disciplin'd and directed) doth fairly promise, are yet justly to be expected. It hath turned to the improvement of many mens wildom and circumspection, that they miscarried in 'the beginning of Affairs, who being admonished of their error, have often recompensed small · loffes with larger fuccess; and I doubt whether it ought not rather to be imputed to the Envy of Fortune then to any man's fault, that the constant felicity both of the Commonwealth, and our Family, is by a small detriment thus interrupted; though indeed it is rather to be accounted the good will then the envy of the Gods, by whose providence it is come to pass, that "with this overthrow, not so fatal to the City as effectual to our instruction. we are put in mind of our humane condition, to abate that deadly pride which is usually the effect of excessive 'Prosperity. Whatsoever the matter is, Countrymen, I did certainly foresee some ill luck, when upon "the Convention of the Senate, I did earnestly solicit you would not create my son Consul. For when I confidered that my Father, Grandfather, Great-Grandfather, and other my Ancestors ' had frequently, and my felf five times born that Office, I began to miltruft whether the Gods

But if you will please to decree things more favourably, both your own Authority, and the reputation of the Fabian Family shall yet stand found, and his youthful folly, as it was committed with fome loss to the Commonwealth, shall be amended to its greater emolument and profit. But who dares promife these things? Truly, 'Countrymen, I will, even I will engage my felf to the Commonwealth for my fon, and happy may it prove to the Senate and People of Rome, and our own private Family; I will also go Maxim.S.5-7.1 Legate to the Conful, and partake of whatfoever fortune he shall happen either to find or to make. much decayed. I can performe a fouldiers duty, I can stand in Battel, and if to all things else I were impotent, yet with the Memory of my Former victories I can both terrifie the Enemy and Encourage our own Souldiers; and, which is of greatest concernment, I can with Counfell and Caution temper and direct the impetuous Heat of the Confull's youth which is the on-'ly Cause of the last Missortune; If I knew not the Disposition of my sonne, and were not affured he would embrace any good direction, I would not certainly now neer the end of my "life hitherto led without Blemish, after the bearing so many Consulships both to my owne bikeing and yours, after fignal victories and illustrious Triumphs, I would not hazard all my Gloery pur chased with so many yeares travel and danger, at home and abroad, by trusting it to the Rathness of one in confiderate young man.

This Oration did both move the mindes of all who were prefent, and also ingenerate a Confidence of better fuccess for the future. Old Fabins was by an Unanimous consent created Legate, all preparations were made with what diligence care and Expedition might be; and the fum Conful took the field with no less favour and Hope of the People, then he had lately returned with their indignation and reproaches. Henceforward both in their march and in their Camps nothing was omitted either of good Discipline, or what the art and experience of an old General could ordaine, and those Companions whom Q. Fabins the Father had by good turnes, or by the admiration of his virtue obliged to himselfe, were very ready to perform whatsoever was enjoyned them; the Souldiers also greedy to blot out their former diffrace, and confiding in the Counsel of a Leader, under whose conduct they remembred the Samnites to have been often beaten by themselves : and their Fathers did earnestly desire opportunity of encountring the Enemy. On the other fide the Samnites were no less elevated with contemplation of their late victory; fo that one Party striving to retaine their purchased Glory, the other to repair what was loft, they joyned iffue most vehemently with all the force and might on both fides. And now behold the Romans in a worse condition then before. C. Ponisus Herennius the Enemies Orofius 3. 22. General having hemm'd in the Conful with a felect band; when Maximus observing the danger his fon was in fetting spurre to horse flings himself into the thickest of the Enemies Troopes : He was followed immediately by a Party of Horse, who beside the motion of their own Courage were ashamed to see one Old man affault with a resolution to overcome so many spirightful young Lads in the flower of their strength. This sudden storme govern'd the Fortune of the whole Battel. The Roman Legions animated with the boldness of their Cavalrie, at first well received the Enemy, and straightway repell'd them: Herenning in vaine refishing, who, that day performing all the Ontes both of a good General and a good Souldier, endeavouring to rally his files to retaine the Cowardly, and withftand the affailants, could neither hinder the Flight of his men, nor afterward find opportunity of escape for himself. Four thousand Samnites were taken with their General, The Battel and the flight swallowed up 24000. The Enemies Camp was likewise seized on with vast plunder in it, which was quickly much encreased by Forrage of their Grounds, and taking in of Towns both by storme and upon Mercy; This great change Eutrophilis of Affaires was wrought by the access of one onely Person, insomuch that the lately Victoria lib. 11. ous army is now routed by the Conquer'd party, and the Confull carries away captive that General by whom he was formerly himselfe shamefully beaten, which was a pleasing spectacle to. the Romans, and a great Ornament to his Triumph, which by the ready good will of the People he made into the City the next yeare. While the Fabii thus order'd things in Samninm the other Confull D. Brutus (whose Province was among the Falifei) had the like happy success: Zonaras For being affifted by Sp. Carvilius his Legate (for twas thought fit to joyne a Legate also with him, a man as skilful in war, so one that had experience of the Enemy, against whom last year he did fourtunately mannage affaires) he did waft no fmall of the Refidue of Etruria, and overcame in a fet battel the Falisci daring to encounter with him. These newes being brought to Rome, when the time of Conveneing the Senate was come, and it feemed not fit for the Common-wealth to withdraw the Confulls from their charges, an Interregnum was agreed upon, The Regent L. Postbumius Megellus, in a Court of his own holding, was himself declared Confull; a precedent till that day unhear'd of, unless in the Person of Appins Claudins, which never- Liv. 3.55. theleffe no good man approved. There is an antient story that the Same Asculapius having assamed the forme of a Serpent was carried from Epidaurus to Sicron by a Toske of Mules, one Nicagora, the wife of Echetimus driving the wains.

The Fathers all agreeing that the Gods had chosen that place, decreed a Temple as bothere exceed to Asculptim. The sickness whether by this remedy, or that it had otherwise run its full course did suddenly cease; the Temple was quickly inriched with many extraordinary offerings, and its renown wonderfully spread abroad by those who profest to have received help in their diseases from this God. L. Posthumiu the um de arte gym-Conful carried the same pride with him into his Province which he had exercif'd against his Colnaftica.1.1. Diony, apud Va. lengue at home: For whereas Q. Fabius Gurges, the last years Conful, did by order from the Senate mannage affairs in Samnium as Proconful: Post bumius arrogantly writes to him commanding him to depart the Province, in as much as himself was sufficient to wage that War. Fabins answering with the Dercee of the Fathers, and that it was not safe for him to desert a business imposed on him by the Senate; the Romans upon this news feared lest by the discord of the Commanders, the Common-wealth would be damnified: Wherefore 'twas thought fit to fend Dion and Va- with the Army in Samnium. Posthumius having returned an absurd and broken Answer; ad-

Legares to the Conful, to defire in the Senates name that Fabius might be fuffer'd to continue ded withall a speech of singular impudence: That during his Consulship, he was not obliged to obey the Senate, but they him; and that his actions might correspond with his words, forthwith difmiffing the Legates, he marcheth with his Army to Cominium, which City Fabius did then befiege; refolving (if by no other means he could) by fight to remove his Rival: The Roman Armies had afforded the enemy a foul spectacle, if Fabius had refifted with the same he was affaulted; but he being better temper'd both by nature and his Fathers documents departed the Province, having profest that he resided not to the Confuls fury . but to the good of the Commonwealth. Posthumins in a few dayes reduced Cominium, whence leading his Army to Venusia, and taking that also, he carried about the War to other Towns; many whereof partly by force, partly by treaty were brought under his power. In this Expedition ten thousand of the enemies were flain, fix thousand two hundred casting down their arms, yeilding themselves to the mercy of the conquerours. The Confuls atchievements were no way contemptible, but the grace of them were spoiled by his pride and Insolence: Wherefore when he did by Letters adwife the Fathers that the City and Territory of Venufia was very convenient for a Colony therein to be planted, the counsel indeed was accepted, but without mention made of the Author of the Victory and the councils, other men had the conduct of the Colony of twenty thouland men; for fo I find it in Authors of no small credit: A great number indeed and almost exceedtions ing belief, but that it seems reasonable, that in the midst of Nations, yet unsubdued they should think of placeing a confiderable force, as a double guard both against the Apulians and the Lucarians. Now the flubbornels of Posthumius, as befides other grudges and offences, it contraeted him much envy; so it tended much to encrease Fabins his Favour and good opinion with all men, fo, that when he came to the City, and had made relation of his performances, his triumph was readily affented unto. Being now Proconful he did on the Calends of Anguff make his triumph over those Samnites who are called Pentri: Old Fabius followed his Columna capi-Chariot on horf-back, whom the people beheld, and by their acclamations acknowledged not on-toline. ly an Affiliant, but the author of the Victory. the wound of his own spirit, and imitate those imaginations against him, which ought by modefty of speech and carriage to have been asswaged. He abstained not from complaints against his enemies, nor from reproaches against the Senate, and to spite the Fathers, he destributed the whole prey among the fouldiers, and disbanded his army before a fixceffor could be fent him. He triumphed likewife contrary to the pleasure of the Senate, which, though some refer to his Livie. 10.37. fecond Consulship, I believe more fitly agrees with this conjuncture, and it is so affirmed by au Dionifius, thors of no mean credit in Hillories: By these doings he drew new hatred upon himself, and he was no fooner out of office, but the two Tribunes of the people upon a fet day accused him; Befides what hath hitherto been mentioned, 'twas objected against him, that before he march's armed Liv. Fabins Maximus Prince of the Senate, there is a likely conjecture, which is otherwise confirmed, for that honour did constantly remain in three of that Family successively; as for example, Maximus received it from Ambustus his father, and transmitted it to his son Gurges. While affairs were in a good state abroad, they were troubled with discord and sedition at home. The Comminalty being far in debt required a general discharge by publick authority for all debts and bonds passed aforetime, without any fatisfaction; this was an old divice, and for two hundred years and upwards varioufly agitated, even as any turbulent Tribune should exasperate them, or the Extortion of Usurers move their indignation. Under the former Confuls, the fear either of the Pestilence or the Enemy did fmother these contentions in some measure; but 2. Marcius Tremulus and P. Cornelius Arvina being Confuls, and the year, enfuing M. Claudius Marcellus, and roundation of C. The Consuls therefore judging it a business not to be neglected, informed the Senate thereof, where upon sentence past, Plorius was condemned to prison, and by a Law in that case established, All men whosoever through the whole City had bound themselves slaves for debt, were set at liberty. I am not ignorant that instead of T. Veturius some Authors make mention of Publius the son of a Colonel, who was one of the contrivers of the Caudine peace. Forty years before this, for the like cause, was a Law made for the annulling such Indentures; nevertheless the Usurers growing so hard hearted, and the former Law, by the patience of Debters (refusing nothing in the midft of their penarie) being by degrees neglected, 'twas though fit they fould be admonished by so fresh an example to provide more full and diligent caution for the future.

At length wandring through unknown and unfriendly places, guided by no certaine Line, they light upon Domitius the Confull, and immediately joyne Battell with him; But their unhappy rashness confounded both their Reason and Discipline: many being flainein Battel, the Residue growing mad with Rage and despaire sheathed in their own Bowells, those weapons they had in vain drawn against the Enemy. Insomuch as so sudden and vehement a Judgement overtook a late most flourishing People for their villany in murthering Embassadours, that in the space of few months they were totally cut off, and ceased any more to be numbred among Nations, whose laws they had violated and Transgressed: For even the small Remnant of the Senones who had betaken themselves to their Neighbours, and Kinsmen the Boil, were the next year by Dolabella the Confull with an universal flaughter clean swept away. that there is not thought to be left alive one Man of that Nation which had fet Rome on fire. About this time I think it more probable that the Colony was planted in Sena, the Romans Polybius having now an entire possession of their Countrey, and quite taken away their Name out of that part of Italy. Nevertheless the Etrurians and the Boians next year recruiting their army Plinie. with young men now grown up, ventred once more to try the Fortune of a Battell. Then it Polybius. was I believe by 2. Neither thought Livie Epit. 12. they fit any longer to deferre their Defigne, while now the Remnant of the Boians and Etrurians sufficed to distract the Roman Powers. And first of all the Samnites, again breaking their League and openly joyning force with the Lucanians and Brutians, commenced the Warre. But thele were overcome by C. That as the Embassadors pressed through the croud of the Tarentines out of the Theatre a certain Buffoon, one Philonides (for in this the Tarentines were beholding to their good manners, the Names of their Jefters were recorded in their Annals, though their Princes were forgotten) like an impudent Dog, piff'd upon the facred Vestments of the Embassadors. After this, receiving no other answer, they failed home. Now at Rome, L. Emilius Barbula, and Q. Marcius 472 Philippus, had begun their Confulthip, by whom the Senate being convened, and the Robedefiled, as it was, being thew'd by the Embatfadors, who declared to the Fathers the whole feries of affronts and indignities heaped on them by the Tarentines: Their spirits were in an high manner incensed, and not so much as any scruple made of vindicating their reproach by Arms. But because they had already to deal with so many mighty Nations, they could not resolve whether now immediately, or hereafter to fend an Army against the Tarentines, and the debate continued many dayes even from morning till night: Some were of opinion, That nothing should be enterprized before the other Cities, at least those near Tarentus were reduced; others contended, That the war should incontinently be commenced; at last, numbring their votes, it was decreed. That the business of the Tarentine war should be referred to the people. The people with an unanimous confent agreed upon the War, and accordingly letters were fent to Amilius the Conful, who was then gone to the Army into Samnium, That omitting all things at present, he should pitch his Camp in the Tarentine Fields, and, unless he could procure satisfaction for the injuries received, that he should prosecute them with a just and boly War. The Tarentines perceiving they had now no longer to deal with a few unarmed men but a just and well order d Army, rouzing themselves out of their accustom d sottishness, began serioutly to enter into counfel, what was to be done; to accept of the war was dangerous, to do what the Romans required in fatisfaction was base, and to avoide both impossible: While their opinions were thus doubtful, one among the rest stood up and said, "Why do we thus, OT arentines, wast the time in vain altercations? the times are come which require Deeds rather then "Words, which that they may be order'd to the publick benefit, there is need of free Speech and fincere Counsel. Neither would I have you so interpret me, as if I stood up to bit you in the teeth with past misdemeanors; for unseasonably to object old crimes is the part of an enemy, and one who wantonly infults over others infirmities: And an honest man that is 'careful of the common fafety, will hide and excuse the faults of his City, unlesse the remembrance of them be of concernment to the avoiding some publick Calamity. For seeing we are but men, to pretend freedom from all error, would argue too much Pride: But often to 'fall at the same stone, and not to grow wifer when the very event plainly chastiletheour rash-

'ness, is not consistent with right reason. We have at one man's warning assaulted and drown'd the Roman ships, and presently with open war vexed our Kinsmen the Thurines, because they had rather be protected by the Romans, then swallowed up by the Lucanians and Brutians; "moreover, we have suffered shameful indignities to be cast on the Roman Embassadors; so that a war we might have avoided, a heavy dangerous war we are not provided for, hath in a " most unlucky time overtaken us. Finally, the Roman Camps are now pitch't in our fields, and 'and we as yet wavering in our counsel, deliberate still whether it be safer to accept a formidable war, or make a dishonourable peace. And I would to God at length, that laying afide all felf flatery, and forgetting felf-interest, and aiming at the publick honour and profit, we " might freely and truly confult together, there might certainly a way be found of making an honest league, or a safe war. But now I see you clearly divided into two parts, I may say sactions, not taking counsel out of judgment or as the state of things require, but every man

'poorer fort fland for peace? and why do none of the rich and ancient men defire war? what Zonaras other reason can be given of so equal a division in the City, but these that would fain in quiet reap the commodity of their Lands and Usury, the other in time of war, hope for command and biherty of plunder? This is an old disease amongst us, neither of a long time hath our Commonwealth wanted fuch men, who even with the danger and detriment of the City have flu- Diodorus died to increase their own private wealth. All which may happily be prevented (for I must foeak what I think at prefent most conducible) if ye will neither buy peace on such base conditions as shall infringe the priviledges of a Free City, nor yet trust fingly to your own Forces in fo difficult a war. Our Anceltors have often committed the conduct and command of their Appiant Armies to forreign Leaders: Either out of Peloponnefus or out of Sicilie we have fent for Strab, book 6 Archidamus the fon of Agefilaus, afterward for Cleonymus, then prefently for Agathocles. Even in our own memory when we were infelted by our Neighbours, our Fathers made use of

Alexander the Epirot: By which means they did not only themselves succeed prosperously Liv.8. 24 but left things in a flourishing condition to us. There is at this day the same friendship between sus and the Epirots, neither are they now leffe potent in an Army and a Commander: And the benefit is fresh in memory, which Pyrrbus received from us, in that with our whole Navy we affifted him in his attempt against the Corcyreans. Therefore esteem this not as my counsel; Paulan, book it but as the counsel of the wifest men who have heretofore happily governed this Commonwealth, which we ought therefore at least to follow, because in the former example you may discern both the reason and ground, as also the issue and successe of it. And yet otherwise, there may be arguments most evident and sufficient to the same purpose; There is no manamongst us so fingularly eminent, to whom all the reft will willingly submit themselves, and what danger there is in emulation, when we have to do with a fierce and potent Enemy, ye are not ignorant. And 'who foever ye shall make General, either by his too great affection to peace, or by his ambition of carrying on the war, may wrong your affairs; not to fay, that tis not fafe to commit a war into the hands of any ordinary person against the Romans, an hardy stout Nation and inur'd to Arms. But the truth is, which none can doubt of, that Pyrrhus is not by any man exceeded in virtue and experience of Mashal affairs. But perhaps he will not come? Certainly, being a man defirous of action, and having no other war at prefent, he will not only Pyribe 6.25 come himself, but bring a formidable strength, and that of no fresh-water souldiers. And if 'ye fear his encroachment upon your Liberties, ye may treat with him on fuch conditions as the Commonwealth may be fecur'd. By this means ye may either obtain an honourable peace, or befrow a glorious one. Though indeed it be not the leaft of my hopes, that the Romans will rather beforehand deal with us on equal terms then admit of Pyrrhus into Italy, having heretofore feared a King of much lesse glory and renown out of the same Epirus. This counsel prevailed not only fo far, as to make them fee a probable way opened to the publick fafety, but likewise the assembly being divided into two contrary opinions, neither part being able to prevail over the other, they did all unanimoully concur in this, as feeming indifferent to borh Tis reported, when the Rumour was spread about the Citie, that a decree was made for Plutarch, the invitation of Pyrrhus that one Meson a coveteous fellow, taking a dry wither d chapplet upon Pyrrhus. 16. his head after the manner of Drunkards, together with his minstrel, entred the Theatre; the people according to their idle custome, commanded him to fing and his woman to pipe, after a while silence being made, Meten crys out, Te doe well , O Tarentines, in that ye grant Liberty to them that please, to fing and Dance; for when Pyrthus once comes into the Citie we

'Tis faid he was much confirm'd by the Oracle of Delphos, whose words were indeed of an am-Aug.de.Civ. biguous fease, which yet the Kings ambition did favourably interpret. For consulting about the War he was now to undertake, Answer was made, Poffe eum Romanos vincere, that he should Envise spudCi- overcome the Romans, or the Romans him. But I think his chiefe encouragment was from the enmu spuals-ceron de Divin. Tarentine Embiladour who affirm'd, That out of their own Cisies, with the help of the Lucanians, the Missapians, Samnites and other the confederass, they could easily raise twenty thousand horse and three hundred and fifty thousand foot. With this strength, when he should once have brought the Romans under subjection, he hoped with little paines to attaine the Lordship of all Fustin 18:1 Italy: then a short cut into Sicilie would present him with an Island much at discord and void of a Ruler (the families of Agathocles being deftroyed) and this he thought he might claime by right of Inheritance, as having begotten Children on Lanaffa the daughter of Agathocles; these things happily succeeding he was resolved to make War with the Carthaginians. Tis reported that Cineas, a man of excellent wildome, willing to have the King by his own confession acknowledg that his immoderate defires, whereby the enjoyment of his present felicity was desturbed . were in reason to be restrained, asked him, What he would doe when he had overcome the Romans? Pyrrbu then declaring how one victorie would beget another, And what shall we doe. faies he, when all thefe things are accomplift'd? Why then, faith Pyrrhus, we will enjoy the fruits of Peace, the benefit of case and Idlenesse. To which Cineas replied, And why, O King, can we not at present enjoy the same things, while they are in our hands? whereas the undertakeing of new Wars may utterly deprive us of them. But a fecond embaffy comeing from the Tarentines, Pyrrhu overcome by his own ambition, answer'd, That 'twas the custome of the Epirots Juftinius. Diodori Eclog. to wage war, not only for themsclues, but for their companions and friends also. But to diffemble his more secret counsells, he articles very prefisely with the Embassadours, That alloone as book 12 he had reliev'd them, he should be suffer'd to returne home; and not be detain'd in Italy any longer Zonaras then necessity should require. Then with all might and maine intending himselse upon prepara-Paufan.Bo. 1 tion for the War, he causeth a great number of long ships to be made ready, and likewise trims up others for transportation of men and horse. Now having Employed most of the Italian Embassadors (whom under a pretext of honour he detain'd as hostages and pledges) in levy-Plutarch ing and conducting of forces. he fent the rest beforehand to Tarentum, with three thousand armed men, and Cineas for Commander. By their arrival all hopes of peace were broken off, Zonaras

Agis his government abrogated, and by decree of the people the guidance of affairs committed to one of them who were now returned from Epirus. Not long after Milo being fent by the King, secures the Tower of Tarentus with a Garrison, and claims the cultody and defence of the walls, with the very good will, of the multitude, who were glad to see strangers undertake all the trouble and labour, while they safely enjoy'd their rest; they therefore chearfully decree Corn for the fouldiers and Mony for Pyrrhus. In the mean time L. Amilius understanding of the Arrivall of these beyond-sea fouldiers.

that he might have the fafer winter quarters, resolv'd to draw his army into Lucania. His Erontinas 1,4 journey was by certain narrow passages shut in on the one hand with the Sea, on the other with ragged and impassible Rocks. The Tarentines having intelligence of his purpose, fail'd by that shore with their ships surnished with Cross-bows and Slings, assaulting the souldiers as they passage the state of fed through strait and open paths with stones and darts. But Emilius, not being able to help himself by virtue, secur'd his passage by cunning; the Captives which before he had placed in the Rear, he now draws to that side of the ranks which was obnoxious to danger, in pity of whom, the Tarentines fearing to hurt their own men, spared also the enemy. These things were done at Tarentus this year. At Rome C. Fabricius Lufcinus, who in his Consulfhip had egregioully overcame the Sammites, and Lucanians entred the Capital in Triumph. Q. Marcine not many daies after obtained the same honour, being returned out of Etraria with prosperous fuccefs. The reason why, the Etrurian war not as yet being finished, he was called out of his Province at such a time of years (for Fabricius triumph'd the third of the Nones of March) is not recorded. I conceive he was recall'd by the Senate, who being troubled with expectation of Pyrehus, did from every quarter gather together what strength they could. The Pro-Aug.de Clv. letaris, the fixth and last rank of Citizens, who of old were priviledg'd from going to war, were now lifted, and being not able by reason of their poverty to provide themselves with arms, they were furnished by the publick; for at this time war being on every side commenced, it was ne-Orofins 4:1 ceffary the Commonwealth should be defended by many Armies. These mens office was, while the Legions were otherwise imploy'd, to guard the City with watch and ward, being disposed in leveral stations upon the walls, and in the Market-place. Neither by all these contrivances could the Imminent calamities have been averted, but that the fortune of a City ordained to Rule did in these most dangerous times produce men of so great Excellency, as I know not whether ever the could boast of better: Men, not so eminent for their Riches or Extraction, as truly ennobled by their Virtue and contempt of wealth. This Age had its Curii, Fabricii, Corunciani, men of no great Ancestors or Possessions, but of most ample fame, which they obtained by their upright example, exact skill in Marshal assays, and an answerable innocence of Manners; who were every where helpful to their Country, which had now need of Champions, which were able not only to relift the sword of the enemy, but to scenn his gold, having to deal with a King who was potent in both. In the mean time Pyrrhus, not waiting for the fpring, coming with two and twenty Thousand foot, three thousand horse, twenty Elephants, and a confiderable band of flingers and archers, was in the midft of his Voyage fo toffed with a Tempelt, that he narrowly escaped being cast away. For the Navy being dispersed, and most of the ships distressed, when the Admirall was in danger, Pyrrbus leapt into the sea, and with very great paints at length hardly fwam to shoare: But the strength and spirit of his minde did much helpe the weakness of his Body, together with the dilgence of the Messapians, on whose shoare he was cast, who with all offices of humanity did foment and cherish him : with their affishance likewife, some few ships, which had cscaped the violence of the storme, being brought into the Hawen, there were gathered together some few horse, with two Elephants, and under two thousand footmen, with this force he marched to Tarentus, being met by Cineas who came forth with his fouldiers to conduct him thither, and being entertained with much joy he took his rest for some dayes : In which space having observed the Manners of the City to be so order'd, that unless they were amended, there was no possibility of protecting it, but that rather the Patrons themselves would likewise be undone by it, he took no open notice at the present. But a while after, his dispersed ships meeting together, when he had strength sufficient, he shut up their wrestling places, and Porches, where the idle youth use to spend whole dayes in walking and fooling he forbad their Banquets and Drinking-matches, and reduced their folemn Games from Intemperancy to a just Mediocrity.

Those who were not in armes he compell'd to be most part of the day in the Market-place; by Plutarch which strange usage the Citizens borne and bred up in shameful Luxury were grievously perplex- Zonaras ed, calling it a flavery to be thus ferved against their wills, choosing rather to perish with idlenels and Luft. The offence was aggravated by the Infolence of some of the King's Guard who Plutareb choosing Quarters at their own pleasure, possessed them against the will of their Landsords, Appian. apud using much license towards their Wives and Children. Wherefore many being wearied out, Valefum. for fook the City, and fettled themselves in the Country, till at length that likewise was forbidden, the Ports being flut, and guards appointed. Then indeed the Tarentines perceiv'd that in Zoneras ftead of a Companion they had got a Mafter, and what onely Comfort was left them, when they had any handsom occasion of meeting, they bewailed their Condition with indignation and Complaints, and charmore freely, when besides their other Passion, they were heated with Wine; There wanted not those who informed Pyrrhus of this, and fome of them being sent for, were val. Of this number was Ariftarchus a principal Man much beloved of the Citizens, and of great repute for his Eloquence . Pyrrhus perceiving him to be very Popular, upon a certain emergent Occasson commands him to saile into Epirus. Arifiarchus (knowing it was present Death to difobey the King; and that to obey him was, though not of fo fudden, yet of as certain ill Consequence) taking thip, after he had sailed a little way, steer'd his course to Rome, where being received into credit, he inform'd the Senate of many Affaires of great Concernment : While Pyrrhus thus busied himselfe at Turentus, the Romans were no less careful in making Leavys for the warre, they had raifed Money, and fent Fabricius to their Confederate Cities, either by his Authoriey or Grace to restrain them from Innovation in State; Those who were most sufpected were kept in awe by Garrisons conveniently placed amongst them. For the strength of fo many Nations combining themselves against one Commonwealth, and their expectation of fo Warlike a King, had very much moved the humours of the Italians who were either defirous zoners: of Change, or provoked with the periwalion of Injuries received; which made the Romans Zoneres the more diligent to provide for their own fafety by a timely suppressing all Occasions of sedition. About this Time an Accident befelf the Pransfine Nobles very remarkable, for they being brought to Rome late in the Evening were for Custody's sake lock't up in the Publick Treafury, whereby at length they understood the Deceit of an Oracle, which they did make use of to firre up their Countrymen to Rebellion, often averring, it was Decree'd by the Fates, That the Roman Treasury Bould be possessed by the Pranestines. The Fathers being already much perplexed, had further Intelligence that Fabricias, was detained by their Confederate and Companions as a Pledge to fecure the fafe return of their hostages from Rome, and that Embassadours Dion. apud were fent to incite the Etrurians, the Umbres and the Gaules against the People of Rome : whereat they were infinitely troubled as at a fact in it felfe horrid, so of ill Example, left in such a Dan-feizing upon the City. The delign was favour'd by occasion of the present warre, which so wholly took up the Romans that they had no Leifure to mind the affaires of Rhogium; Belides on the opposite shore were the Mamertines, an Example of the like successfull villany, and ready no doubt to defend the like Treachery in others, especially being tyed with the Relation of the fame Common Country: For they likewife were of Campania, and of late yeares going to warre amongst the Auxiliaries of Agathocles, and being entertained by the Messenians as Friends, having flain and cast out the Citizens, possess'd the place themselves: sharing likewise among themselves their houses, wives and Estates. They called to mind also the Campanians of old, who by the like wicked art got Capua from the Tufcans. When they had now agreed upon the Business, there was nothing left to be consulted on, but only the Manner, how safely to execute their Defign, lest in fo populus a Citie, the lesser number should be surrounded and slain by the greater. Decius counterfeiteth Letters as wrote from the Rhegians to Pyrrbus, to betray the Roman Garrison to him; these Letters as if they were intercepted, are read to the souldiers in private, Decius bitterly complaining of the Perfidiousness of the Rhegians, and some souldiers being subborned to it, cry out, Twas time to provide for their own safety by the fword, and turn that Destruction which was destin'd to them upon the heads of the Authors and as the bufiness was fer, a Meslenger comes in with newes, That Pyrrhus his Navy was feen by the store, and fecret discourses were had between him and the Rhegians. The fouldiers now beside their former Covetoninels, were much incensed with the Treachery of the Enemy, and sear of Danger; It is therefore by Common Confent refolv'd upon, Th at the Townefmen fhall be oppreffed unawares and unprepared, that having flain the Men, ult the Publick and Private wealth of the City fall be distributed to the Legion. Behold now an unworthy and horrid fact; Decius having invited fome of the Prime men to Supper, against the holy Rites of Hospitality, takes away their Lives others were every where flain in their own houses; the greater part of the Rhegians being thus murtinered, the reft were banished their Country, even by those whom of late they had entertain'd under the Name of Friends and Companions, for prefervation of themselves and their Countrey. Execution being done, there is now a new face of Publick affaires: the houses and Effaces of the poore wretches like the Plunder of an Enemy, is divided amongst the Thieves; and while the Blood is yet fresh and warme, the Matrons and Virgins are forced to Marry the murtherers of their husbands and Parents; and the Cruel Perfidious Legion arrogates to it felfe the Title and Rights of the City of Rhegium: But it hath pleased God well to provide for Mankinde, that fuch rare examples of high Mischiese should prove likewise as manifest Examples of Vengeance and Divine Justice; Lest we should onely by consideration of the success be animated to the like Villany, and not by the Issue and event be deterr'd from evil doing, so

These Rascalls did not long enjoy Comfort or Tranquility amongst themselves; The seare of the Romans and Pyrehus they did indeed avoid, as by reason of the present Conjuncture of Affaires, so by holding strict society with the Mamertines, and resolving to Offend neither Party: For 'twas thought fafest in their first beginnings to abstain from warre at the present, while their New City which had so violent and sudden an Original, should have time to itrengthen, compact and knit it felfe well together: they faw that without Danger they could not molest the King, and were in hopes the more readily to obtain Pardon from the City. At length feeing no warre approach neer them, and being by degrees debauch'd with idleness and imitation of the Greek Customes, they began to compare the Advantage they had now in their hands with the hard and laborious life they had hitherto led; and with much Covetousness and Envy did frequently discourse in all their meetings and quarters of the convenient scituation of the City, and the happiness of the Inhabitants. Decims was well pleased with this, who being himfelf grown as Licentious, had long ago conceived an inward defire of the Romans, if they bore not arms against them. The first cause of differition, as is usual among Vol. Maximus Thieves, arose from an unequal division of the Plunder. Decision in the sedition was cast our and betook himself to Messana, the Souldiers at Rhegium chose M. Casius his Secretary for their Didorus Commander, and Decim carrying with him a great bank of mony, was honour'd with the fame dignity by the Mamerines, though his fortune was neither prosperous nor of continuance. For it hapned, that being troubled with fore eyes, he caused some Eminent Physician to be fought out for him; the Divine Vengeance hereby overtaking the wicked man with most sharp and bitter punishments: A Physician was therefore brought unto him, who provid to be by birth a Rhegian, but because he had lived so long at Messana, his original was not only unknown to Decim, (who would never have trusted himself to the mercy of a Rhegian) but likewife to most of the inhabitants of the City.

He being mindfull of his Country and refolving now to be revenged for its Calamites, perswaded Decision that the remedie he brought, was indeed strong in Operation, but of quick and most certaine efficacy: So applying the medicine which he had temper'd with the Juice of Can-Diodoran thatides, and giveing order it should not be removed till he returned to the Patient, without delay he taketh ship, and slyeth from Messana. Decius being along time sufficiently tormented Apries with incredible paines, feeing his Physician came not at him commanded the Medicament to be removed , which being washed off, he perceived himself to be starke blind. So that being now a blind Exul, infamous and dispiled, he is reserved to judgement, as if he were bound in Chaines, by a wonderfull Method of Divine Vengeance, in that he received this Plague from one to whom he had trusted his health, even as he himselse had by Cruelty and treachery circumvented those whom he ought to have protected. Tis fit such Examples as these should be recorded in Hiltory and transmitted to posterity, for the Benefit of mankind which is never sufficiently convinced how farre these Cunning practiles are different from wisdome and right reason; so that neglecting the Rules of Virtue, Honesty, and Fidelity, they doe for love of false and onely feeming good things by foul and villanous lufts involve themselves in true Evills.

O W at Rome, part of their forces being kept at home for guard of the City, and for a referve against the uncertain chances of war, the Armies and Provinces were committed to the charge of the new Confuls. P. Lavisius Lavisus was deligned against the Tarentines and Pyrrbus, and Zonarus Ts. Coruncianus fent to finish the Etrurian War. Lavinns, thinking it would much avail as to his own reputation, so to the Terror of the enemies to provoke them first; and that it was profitable to the Commonwealth, to avert the fear and inconveniences of War, as far as might be, from the Roman Territories; leading his Army into Lucania, did there fortifie a Calife in a convenient place, furnishing it with a strong Garrison, both to retard the proceedings of Pyrrhus, and to keep the Lucanians in awe, whose treachery was feared, left they should dare to revolt to the enemy. Pyrrhus having intelligence of the Roman Conful's approach, though his forces were not yet affembled together, judging it both dishonousable and hurtful now in the beginning of the War to manifelt any token of Fear, with what ftrength he had at present, did forthwith march out to meet him. But that he might find some colourable pretence to draw out the business and gain time, he sent a Messenger with Letters of these Contents: Pyrrhus she King wishesh Health to Lavinus; I understand that thou art come:

forth with thine army against the Tarentines, but leaving it for a while, come thou unto me with a small Retinue, and I, taking cognizance of the quarrel, will compel even those who are unwil. ling, to yield one to the other in what is equal and right. To this Lavinus answer'd, We neither accept of thee as an Arbitrator of our Controversies, nor fear thee as an Enemy. But thou feemest to do very absurdly in assuming to thy self the Judgment of other mens Causes, who art the felf guilty of a Crime, and haft not as yet received due punishment for entring Italy without our confent. Know then, that I come no leffe against thee then the Tarenines, to try our Right and Title with a Just army, by the Judoment of Mars the Author and Founder of car Nation. And without delay moving his Ensignes, he sits down between the Cities of Pandosia and Heracka, in a Champian ground, being divided from the Enemies Camp by the River Sirius. Tis reported that Pyrrhu, walking downe to the River fide to view the Romancampe, when he had well and diligently confider die, faid to one of his freinds, Megaeles by name,

These Barbarians have martiall'd their Army after no barbarous manner, but wee shall soone try, what metall they are of. Then having placed strong guards upon the bankes, to hinder their Passage through the Fordes, he resolved to expect the comeing of his Companions; not one ly for the Reason of War, hopeing the Romans in an enemies Country would quickly be in want of necessary accommodations, but as much regarding the spirit and confidence of Levimus, whose admiration was by a new Testimonie encreased with him, in that he had freely without punishment dismissed those spies, which were sent to view his Campe, telling them moreover, That he had another Army bigger then this. In the meane time the Campe being fo neer. there were many Pickeereings and light skirmishes which tended nothing to the main chance, Viterbienfus. Almost fifty dayes being now spent in these light skirmishes, the Consul being moved with the fame reasons to hasten the fight, as Pyrrhus was to defer it, affembling his Souldiers together, gave them to understand his Intentions, and encouraged them against the fear of a new enemy, extenuating, as much as might be, the fame of Pyrrbus, and the Terror of the Elephants; at length preparing himself for all assayes, he resolves either to fight the enemy by Consent, or compel him to Battel. Therefore feeing Pyrrhus still continue in his resolution, he sendeth out beforehand all his horse, as if to forrage the Country, himself with his Legions in Battel Array, expecting till the tumult and noise on the other side of the River should give them warning. The horse setching a compass far from the Camps, cross the River where no Guard was, and immediately advance to the enemies stations on that fide the River: The Epirots terrified with their fudden approach, betook themselves to their Camp. Pyrrhus understanding the enemie was so near marcheth in all hast to the River with his whole body of horse, consisting of three thoufand, hoping the Romans in their paffage through a blind Ford, firiving with the fiream and un-evenness of the ground and breaking their orders, might there be vanquished. But the Roman horse interpoling themselves, Pyrehus riding at the head of his Troops, conspicuous in his shining armor, of fingular strength of Body and Resolution of mind, he managed the fight every way correspondent to his Fame and Reputation. He so exactly order'd the whole Battel with his Counsel and Directions, as if he were free from all other labour; yet, as occasion ferv'd, he would charge and fight in person, as if to him belong'd only the Office of a Private Souldier and that the case of the General iffue were another man's bufiness. In the mean time one Leonatus a Macedonian, having observed a certain enemy, who neglecting all others, intended himself only against the King, as he flew up and down the field, directing his horse to whatsoever quarter he spied him in, gave Pyrrhus notice of it, who answer'd, No man can avoide the Fate of Mortals, but neither this Italian, nor any other, shall grapple with me mithout his remard, and due punishment. He had scarce spoken the words, when Oplacus (so was the man named, a Captain of one of the Frentan Troops) wounded the Kings horse with his Spear, Leonatus likewife wounding his, whereupon the Kings friends round befetting him killed Oplacus, floutly fighting for himself, and delivered the King. But this accident did much daunt the Kings party,

> But the death of Megacles had like to have reduc'd Pyrrbus his affairs even to a most defperate condition, who being in the Kings armour was affaulted by every valiant Enemy who affected the Glory of flaying the King: And at length an Horseman, Dexter by name, having kill'd him, and taking off his' Helmet and Gorget, with loud crys carried them to the Confull, thereby ingenerateing a beliefe in both the Armies of the Kings Death. Hereupon the Gracians were full of Terrour and Consternation, and no doubt had immediately quitted the Feild, but that Pyrrhus affoone as might be, uncovering his head rode up and down, with a loud voyce witnesseing, That he was a live, and present amongst them, hereby taking away as much Confidence from the Romans, as seare and Despaire from his owne souldiers. Lavinus perceiving the Time come, wherein to trie the utmost Remedie, gavethe Signe to his Horsemen whom he had placed in Ambush, to fall upon the backe of the enemie, But Pyrrhus against > as believing him to be flain: Wherefore to confirm his Souldiers, as likewife to decline dangers intended against him, he changed his Armour and weapons with Megacles, and leaving him in the Fight, went himself to order and lead up the Regiments. The Roman Legions were now come up, and the Battel a long time fiercely continued with fo doubtful fuccels, that 'tis reported Fortune seven times changed, sometimes the Romans sometimes the Epirots turn-this Troupe commanded his Elephants to be led, which he had likewise reserved for the last Terrour to the enemie. This one Contrivance dash't all the Romans hopes, and gave the Issue of Frontings 2.4 the Battaile cleerly on Pyrrbus his fide. For the men themselves being all onished at the valt bulk of their bodies, and the terrible shew of armed Warriers on their backs thought they had bulk of their bodies, and the terrible shew of armed Warriers on their backs thought they nad rather seen some strange and formidable Monster, then the shape of any Creature by Nature Paulan, 1 produced; and as for the horse, they being frightned with the fight, smell and noise of beasts Plin. 8.6 they had never before feen, did forthwith, confounding their ranks, flie every one what way was most open; and either shaking off their riders, or against their wills forcing them to slight. they ran upon their own battel, and filled all things with fear and tumult. The Rectors of the Elephants following the perfuit, many of those that fled were wounded from those who flood Zowara in the Towers upon the Elephants, and more were kill'd and trodden under foot by the beafts themselves. The Consul making use of his best skill, did as yet keep his main battel together, Platarch till, by the command of Parrhus, the Theffalian wing being fent amongst them, did rout and fcatter them, not being able to relift. And no question but in the place they were hemm'din. they had every man been flain or taken prisoners, but that, besides the Custom of Pyrthus, who Frominus 2 6 thought it not General like too severely to press upon those who fled, lest by despair of safety they should be provoked to make more sharp resistance, the evening likewise being far spent compelled them to relinquish the persuit. Fortune likewise favour'd the remnant of the unfortunate Europius b. 2 Army, in that an Elephant being wounded turned back and with its braying confounded the reft. This putting a Remora to the enemy, gave liberty to those that fled to cross the River inorder to Apulia, where they sheltered the mselves in a senced City against the present danger. I find that in this fight there were fourteen thousand eight hundred and seventy foot of the Romans and their friends flain, with two hundred and fourfcore horsmen; there were taken in all eighteen hundred and twelve, in which number were eight hundred and two horsmen; there was loft likewise two and twenty Colours. Whereby I wonder the more why some Authors, who undertake exactly to relate this encounter, deny that any notice was taken how many were want- Orefus 4. z ing on the Kings fide; whereas Dionyfins writeth, that Lavinus loft little leffe then fifteen Plurarb thousand, and that on the Victor's side thirteen thousand fell. But Hieronimus Cardianus, an impartial writer of those times, affirms, That of the Roman army there fell but seven thoufand, and of the Kings army under four thousand. But this is by all agreed on, That the Victory cost Pyrrbus the very Flower both of his Captains and Souldiers, and that he was heard orofus to fay, He was no less Conquer'd then Conqueror in that Battel. And when he offer'd the spoiles and gifts to Jupicer of Taroneus, he confessed as much, inscribing that sentence in the Title, and when his friend complain'd, he repli'd, Of a truth, if I obtain [neh another Victory, I shall return into Epirus without e're a Souldier. I have likewise an Author that the King himself re- Jufin, 18.1 7 ceived a grievous wound in this fight, but because others report no such thing, and that I often fee the circumstances of several battels confounded. I dare not in the general silence of so many and those more accurate Authors, give credit to one fingle one.

That it was fought with great animosity and valour, this one argument is sufficient, That Liv. Epit. 13 when Pyrrhus next day view'd the flain corps (which for the reputation of his Humanity and Europius Clemency he caused to be buried) he finding that all the Romans died with honourable wounds Florus 1,18,17 having their faces turn'd to the enemy, he cry'd out, How easie were it for me to gain the Em-Dio spud pire of the whole world, if I had but Roman souldiers! Neither did he deser with any complement and large promifes to court those who were in his power, to receive pay under him, and not being able to perswade them, he did, nevertheless treat them with great humanity and elemency, freeing them from chains and whatever other reproach usually attends the fortune of prifoners. But the Romans thus batter'd by the late fight were terrified with another misfortune, though not of so great loss, yet which caused more fear and Religious horror. For it was imputed to the manifelt anger of the gods, that their men who were fent forth for forrage and relief, were overtaken by a fudden and most violent Tempest, wherein four and thirty were amidst the stupendious noise of the Heavens, struck dead by Thunderbolts, and two and twenty fmitten and left half dead, their Cattel also by the same storm were most of them slain or made

Pyrrbus in the mean time having taken the empty and forfaken Camp of the Romans, made quick use of his victory, wasting all the Neighbour Countries, and turning many people from the Roman friendship. The Lucanians and Samnites then come in to him, whom lightly chiding, That they had not affifted bim in the battel, he nevertheless gave them part of the spoils; therein much rejoycing and exulting, That by his own firength, with no other aid but that of the Tarentines, he had flain fo many of the Romans. Pyrrbus being thus intent in reaping the fruit of his Victory, Lavinus on the other fide curing his wounded, and recollecting his dispersed men, had gathered together a force no way contemptible, and the Senate (though many imputed the losse only to the Consul's default, and Fabricime faid. It feem'd to him, that the Romans were not beaten by the Epirots, but Lavinus by Pyrrhus) decreed a recruit and supply to be sent him. When the Cryer proclaimed, That they who would serve their Country in the place of them who were flain, should give in their names, they lifted themselves so fast, that presently they compleated the number of two

The Conful recruited with these forces, follow'd the steps of Pyrrhus, vexing his Army with what inconveniencies he could. And understanding the Kings Resolution to seize upon Capua leading his Army thither in haft, he prevented him, and preparing all things for Defence, hedeterr'd him from affaulting the City. Pyrrhus turning his Course to Naples, and there likewife being frustrated of his Expectation, forthwith by long journeys marcheth toward Rome in the Latine high way, and now having paffed through Anagnia, and the Hernician Territories raking in Fregellis by the way, he was come to Pranefie within Twenty miles of the City: But the Magistrates there, assoon as they understood of the Overthrow, had by Order of the Senare armed their choice young men : and the Fortune of the Roman People had in this the time of their Necessity, provided them another very strong help and succour; For the other Consult Teb. Coruncianus encountring the Etrurians with better fuccess, had tied the whole Nation to new Covenants, and being called back by the Senate to the Defence of his Countrey, having no other Enemy to distract him, came home with his Victorious Army. Pyrrbus having in vain attempted to draw the Etrurians again into Armes, and confidering that, befides a City fecure with its own guards, he had two Confulls with their Armies, one on the Front, the other on his Reare returned back into Campania; where meeting Lavinus with greater forces then before his Overthrow : I e faid, He had to deale with a Lernaan Hydra, whose beads being lately firuck off, Ip ing up again in a greater Number; yet confiding in his former Victory, he drew out his Army and martiall'd it as resolving to fight, and that he might discover the Cheerfulnessof his fouldiers, and likewife terrifie the Enemy, he caul'd his men to shout and the Elephants to be provoked to bray. But the Romans returned a farre greater and more terrible shout, whereby conjecturing the Spirits of each, he judged it fit to abitain from fight at the Prefent, and complaining of ill omen in the Entrailes of facrifices, he drew back his Army first into his

Camp, and afterward with much plunder and a great Troop of Captives, to Tarreno

Tarentines. But P. Valerius was order'd to draw the Remnant of his Conquer'd Army into the Setine fields, there to fortifie his Camp, and cause them to winter in their huts; About the fame time the Senate disputing whether it were fit to redeem the Captives, resolved affirmatively; that which chiefly perfuaded them, was I believe the Horsemen's Case, for they had flourly maintained the fight during the absence of the Elephants, at whose approach the horse without any fault of the Riders yielded them up to Death, and to Bonds; upon this Errand were fent Embassadours of Principall Dignity, P. Cornelius Dolabella famous for his Desolation of Sana in Gallia, C. Fabricius Imfeinus, and Q. Emilius Papus, who two yeares fince were

Colleagues in the Confulthip : Pyrrhus by Nature was Endow'd with humanity, the infeparable

Companion of great Spirits, and that he did encrease by his Ambition, according to the Vulgar Errour, effeeming all Virtues the servants to Domination, to which onely being intemperately given, he did direct all his Counsells for the attaining it; And though he were not inferiour to any Commander of that Age in Boldness of mind and the Arts of Warre, yet was he wont to try all meanes before he came to Blows; he would folicite the mind of his Enemy as he faw most opportune with Feare, or Defire, or Pleasure, or Mercy, or with equality and benefit of Conditions. Therefore understanding Embassadours were coming from Rome, and judging so many Consular men were not sent but upon some Grand Affaires, he was in good hopes they would treat of Compounding a Peace. Therefore that their access might be the fafer and the more honourable, he fent Lyco (by nation a Molossian) even to the borders of the Tarentine Territories, to meet them with a Guard. Himselfe on Horseback with rich Caparisons met them without the Gates, and having magnificently brought them in, he entertain'd them with all Refrect,

The Romans (who in their hardest times had remitted nothing of their Constancy, but as to the main Issue of the warre alwayes spake high, as conceiving ample hopes) thinking this a most fit time to give rewards and Encouragement to Virtue, decreed a Triumph to L. Amilius Barbula for those exploits performed in his Consulship. He triumphed A.D. the fourth of Capitolina the Ides of July, over the Tarentines, Samnites, and Salentines who were Auxiliaries of the liberality and plenty that might be. They premifing somewhat tending to Moderation of the mind, as how great the Inconstancy of Fortune is, how sudden the Changes of Warre, and that suture Contingents cannot be foreseen . deliver their Message . That they came to receive their (aptives , whether he would suffir them at a Certain price to be redeem'd, or to be exchanged for Tarentines and others. Pyrrhus whose Custom it was, not to transact any thing of moment without advice of his friends, convened them now together; and Mile's Opinion was, That he should detain the Captives, make use of his fortune, and not cease the Warre till be had throughly subdued the Romans; Cineas his Counsell was very different, for, speaking first of the Constancy of the Senate and People of Rome, which they had often shown even in the hardest times to be invincible; he added moreover, As for other Enemies tis likely we may hate their manners or contemne their Armes, but with this Nation, O King, "tis better making Friendship then Warre, and 'tis convenient not only to return the Captives, but freely to dismiss them without Ransome: Neither is any delay to be made, but that you fend back the Embassadours with Presents, to conclude Peace upon equall Termes: For this I take to be the time, wherein with honour and Credit you may accomplish a Business (in my judgement) very necessary. For now your affaires having succeeded prosperously, you shall both more easily by Treaty obtain what you desire, and likewise seem for no other Cause but the innate Greatness and Goodness of your mind, to offer Peace unto those whom you might by force have reduced into flavery. And farre be it from Thee, but that Thy Designes Should profeer as they have begun : Tet We are but Men, and if Fortune change her fide, neither will it be focafie a matter to Obtaine Peace, neither can it with so much honour be treated on. When the rest agreed in the same Opinion, the King himselse likewise affenting, commanded the Roman Em - Dio. spud baffadours to be called , to whom he fpake in this Manner ; Tour Errand, Romans: femeth to Ful, Urfinum. me very unworthy, for having no Consideration of entring into Friendship with me, you require back the Prisoners of Warre, whom being restord, you are ready presently to make use of against me. If therefore you will intend your Minds on better Counsell, beneficiall to both Parties, and make a League and Society with me, I will restore all your Citizens and Companions in Armes without price or Ransom; otherwise if you continue hostility, I shall think it no wise part, to frengthen your Hatred against me with the hands of so many Valiant men. Neither is Money so Appiatus apid scarce with me as to need any from the Romans whom it would better become, if we were Friends, Uffinum.

to be enriched by my bounty; Withall he commanded gifts of good value to be given the Embassadours, with promise he would bestow more and of greater Price. These things were spo Zonarus ken and acted openly in the Presence of all the Embassadours. But with C. Fabricius he had asterward a longer and more serious discourse. Neither shall I think it unfit to relate what I find in good Authors; When therefore they had speech together in secret without witness, among other things 'tis reported the King faid thus : My defire is to have all the Romans my Friends, but especially your selfe, whom I esteem above all others, as most eminent in Civill and Military virtues, onely one Thing I am troubled to find wanting in you, that having but slender substance vou are not able to maintaine that Port and Splendour which juftly attends Great men, as their Due But I will not fuffer you any longer to be fenfible of this Injury, and dispite of Fortune, I will freely bestow so large a summe of Gold and Silver, as you shall easily exceed the Reve-'neues of the Richest. For I am perswaded it belongs to my Place and Fortune, to relieve the hard Wants of Worthy men, who have endeavour'd more to obtaine Glory then Wealth : 'Truely I think it to be a faire and honourable Work, and that there cannot be, either a more illustrious monument of Kingly Magnificence, or a more precious and Acceptable Offering unto the Gods: fo that I shall rather think you do me a Courtesse, then receive one at my hands, if vou will fuffer your felfe to be relieved by my Plenty. Neither truely would I urge this to you if on my lide onely the Bounty should feem Glorious, on your fide the Acceptance dishonourable But now feeing I tempt you not to Treason or the commission of any Fact misbecomPlutarib in ing your Grave Manners; what Reason is there why you should with a resolute and obstinate Pyribs. G. 43? mind refuse a small Gift, with a free and Friendly intent offered? For I desire nothing of you, but, what may, nay of duty ought to be done by the belt of Men, and most tender of their Countrys Good, that you would perswade the Senate to forsake their wishis subborn-'nels, and recall their mindes to Equity and milder Counfells, giving them to understand the Truth: that neither can the Warre be continued without your great Loss and Danger, neither can I (having promised help to the Tarentines, and proved Victor in the first Battell) without manifest breach of faith, and dimunition of mine Honour relinquish it; Neither indeed do

'I delight in fighting with you whom I judge farre more worthy my Friendship then my Hatred, and had much rather return home into mine own Kingdom, where many businesses in the inte' rim arife, which require my presence. And for this I will give you what assurance you shall defire, whereby you may be fatisfied concerning my Intentions, and refolve the Doubts of others; if any shall think it not safe to trust to Kings, by reason of the fault of some, who, franding to their Agreements and Covenants fo long onely as it feemeth for their Profit, when they perceive any benefit to be gain'd by Change, have chosen rather to break their Faith then · lose an Advantage. And when the Peace shall be concluded, there is nothing will please me better, or be more commodious to us Both, then that you would bear me company into Epirus;

"where you shall have the Principal place among my Subjects, be my Lieutenant in Warre, and Partner of all my Fortunes. For I effeem no Possession more precious then that of a Valiant

'and Faithfull Friend, and certainly the splendour of a Kingly Fortune, and the Majesty of Roy-

'all affaires will well become your great Mind. These things if we shall in Common conferre ' mutually helping one the other, we shall without any difficulty attain to the greatest Happiness that man is capable of or can imagine. When the King had thus made an end of speaking, after a little diffance Fabricius answerd, "Concerning my Versue, if any could be observed either in my military or Civill employments, it is needleffe for me to discourse seeing you have already trusted the Relation of others concerningit. Neither is it necessary to declare my poverty, that, being themaster of a little ground 'and a small Cottage, I maintaine my self neither by usury nor the sweat of servants, but by the labour and excercise of my owne Body, seeing this also you have truly learn't by the discourse of others. But if, either on your owne accord, or following the Opinion of others, 'you judge me, by reason of my poverty, to be in worse condition then any other Roman, you are wonderfully deceived. For despising Riches, embracing Vettue, and doeing my duty 'I was never fenfible of any milery ; neithersin private or publick businesse did I ever repine at my Fortune. For what Reason have I to freake ill of fortune, unlesse I should impute it as a only with the Rich, but many times before them? I am dignified with the greatest honours our country affordeth. The heaviest wars are committed to my Charge. I am entrolled with the care of our most holy Devotions, I am call'd into the Senate, my opinion is asked concerning the most weighty affairs. I am commended and chearfully imitated by many neither am I of less esteem then the most potent man in the City; I seem unto others an example and pattern of attaining Virtue and Glory; to all this bestowing no cost either of mine own or others. For in other places, where particular mens wealth is great, and the publick flock but fmall, the Magistrates sustain the dignity and splendor of their office by their own expence:

In our City the cultome is much different, no private mans fortune being on any fide hurthened. All this great and glorious pomp, wherewith our Citizens, who are chosen to the administration of grand affairs, are so magnificently set forth, is of publick allowance, which order maketh all men equal, so that the poorest man shall want nothing for the maintaining

'either the publick or his own grace, neither shall the richest in any thing abound. Wherefore

feeing, though I am the poorest of all, yet I do in no good thing yield to the richest of all;

why should I complain of Fortune? should I defire to be equal with Kings, who may hoard up vast sums and heaps of gold? But hitherto I have spoken in reference to my life in Pub-

' lick, even in private also my indigence is so far from being a burden or inconvenience to me, that contrariwife, as often as I compare my felf with the rich ones, my condition feemeth incomparably more happy, and I reckon my felf among those few who have attained to as ' much Felicity as this life admits of, in which regard I mightily rejoice and give thanks to my Poverty. For it feeming to me idle and foolish to pursue after things superfluous, and that

'my little ground being rightly till'd and manured yieldeth all necessaries; I know not to what

'end I should be solicitous of greater Riches. My Meat hunger makes sweet to me, and thirst

'my Drink; after labour my fleep is easie and quiet; my garments, if they defend me from 'cold, are of proof sufficient; and my houshold stuff, according as it is apt and fit for those "ules it was ordained to, fo it very well pleafeth me. So that herein also I should be injurious to accuse Fortune, that it hath not allowed me larger substance then nature defires, which

ing it together. Wherefore with this my poverty I judg my felf more wealthy then the rich-

eft men, yea, then thy felf alfo; for I have fo much that I defire no more, whereas unleffe

you thought your felf poor notwithstanding your possession of Epirus, and all other your Teritories, why came you over into Italy? But Riches you may object, gives one a fair opportunity of doing good to mankind, and that I in my poverty can be bountiful to no body. 'Truly this troubleth me no more then that in other things also I do not abound: That the gods have not endowed me with knowledg superexcellent, and the Art of Prophecying and many other the like things, whereby I might benefit those who in these kinds want help. But if I freely communicate to my friends and fellow-Citizens those things which are in my power and fuffer every one in common to participate of what may any way pleasure them, I shall think my felf free from that crime of being useless or unprofitable to mankind. Neither would I have you esteem those things small and contemptible, because others seem greater in your eyes, and therefore you are ready to buy men with large bribes, But, if for supplying the necessities of the poor, Riches were altogether to be defired, and that in this respect the possession of moneys were to be reckon'd as a part of Felicity, as you Kings seem to be perfwaded; which think you, were the better way of purchasing wealth, that I should now with diffrace receive it at your hands, or that I should, when it was in my power, have long agoe gather'd it upon most honest accounts? For my prosperous management of Publick affairs, hath given me fair opportunities of growing Rich; as often at other times, to especially when four years fince, being Conful, and fent with an army against the Samnites, Lucanians and Brutians I overcame those large and fertil Territories wasting and spoiling, when being conqueror in many Battels, I took by force and demolish'd wealthy Cities, whereupon the Souldiers being largely rewarded, and all debts paid which the Commonwealth had contracted with private men for carrying on the War, there was yet so much remaining that I carried into the Publick Treasury four hundred Talents. Now after I have scorn'd to acquire just and honest Riches by those spoils which were in my hands, and by the example of Valerius Publicola (and others who have advanced the Roman State) have preferred Glory before mony, shall I receive gifts of thee, and embracea shameful and dangerous opportunity of growing Rich, having neglected a fair, and honourable means? And truly, that wealth I could freely, with pleasure, and good conscience have expended in just and honest uses, which what I receive of you I cannot do : For that money is rather to be accounted lent then bestow'd which proceeds from another's bounty, and however it be given and received under the specious pretence of hospitality, friendthip or good will, tis burthenfome to an Ingenuous and high Spirit till it be restored. And what do you think will be the iffue of this bufinels when it is known (as conceal'd it cannot be) if the Cenfours, who with ample authority exercise the superinspection of Manners amongst us, shall (according to that power wherewith they are invested to enquire into the Lives of the Citizens, and punish those who deviate from the Institutions of our Fathers) publickly summon " me to give an account of the reasons, why I received any Gifts from thee?

Many report that P7 rrbus, refolveing at any rate to winne a man of fuch Excellent vertue, did Eutropies vet more earnestly tempt his Constancy, and after other magnificent promises, makeing a prof. Floris. fer of half his Kingdom could not therewith move him, but that ftill he perfifted to deny the Ac- 1.18.21 complishment of the Kings defires, For, saies he, if I am an evill man, why doe you court me? Auth de viris If good, why would you corrupt me? adding moreover, That this buffinesse would prove neither Illust. 35 pleasing nor profitable to Pyrchus if it should succeed, for if he should make use of his liberty, Appian and twould be hatefull both for the King and his Friends, as for his fustice and Abstinence, if the Epi- Rulvium Urfirots once had experience of them, they would for sake the King and apply themselves wholy to him, num. These things, and what hereafter I shall add, being by various Authors related, I thought nei- Plusarch ther inconvenient nor unprofitable to collect and declare, that the mind and fense of those men Pyrrho. C.44. may be known, who supported the Roman State in most difficult times, and improved it to that incomparable height of Glory and Empire it attain'd to: and that by a clear example it may be apprehended, what Virtues and Manners ought to be practis'd by those men, who would become objects of Admiration, and transmit to their posterity a more flourishing Common-Plutarch wealth then they received from their Ancestours. These things being spoken and heard on both c.43 fides, the King at prefent contented himfelf, but on the morrow, caufing Fabricius to be fent for, he prepared an Elephant before hand to frighten him, who standing at their backs behind the hangings, as they were discoursing, the hangings being on a sudden withdrawn, at the Masters command laid his fnout on Fabricius his head, making a most horrid noise; but he, being a man of a fetled spirit, gravely turning himself about, smiled, saying, Neither yesterday did your gold entice me, nor to day your beaft terrifie me. Afterwards being fet at supper, when he heard Cineas discourling of the Grecian Philosophers of the Selt of Epicurus, that they efteemed Plea- Cu. Cateline fure the greatest good, and the ares of the Commonwealth the chiefest hinderance of Felicity: C.12 That the gods in their opinion led such a life free from the care of humane affairs, free from all Plutarch affettions either of anger against the wicked, or favour to the good, giving themselves over wholy to c.42 idleness and pleasure: Fabricius thereupon is said to cry out. The gods grant that Pyrrhus and Val Maximus. the Samnites would practice this wisdom while they wage War mith the people of Rome. These 4-3,6 were the manners of those times, this was the Emulation of great men, to excel not in wealth or Luxury, but in Virtue, in Counsel, in Patience, in the Love of their Country. Neither were these sudden Motions and fits, or speeches premeditated out of hypocrific for the present occasion, but they did confirm the faith of their words by the constant Tenour of their Lives. whereby they are rather to be admired then imitated by our Age. The same Fabricius when all Val. After the same manner he spent his whole life, insomuch as in all his Patrimony there was not fufficient whereby to raife Portions for his Daughters; (an Honourable poverty!) fo that the Senate caused money for that purpose to be disbursed out of the Publick Treasury, being asham'd to let those Virgins paffe without Dowry, whose Father was not ashamed to leave so. The 4.4.10 fame vertue and continence was found in other Princes of the Senate; among the rest 2. Fabius who had so often been in Chiefe command, and having once borne the Censourship denied Author de viris to be made Cenfour againe, faying, It was not for the good of the Commonwealth, that the illust. Gurees did bestow a dole of flesh upon the people, & likewise made a publick Featt. Curius out of the same gallantry of mind refus d the gifts of the Sahines as Fabricius did the Samnites : Amilius Papas. Cicero in Lello who was in most offices Colleague with Eabricius , also Tib. Cornneianus , and many other Ennim apud men of great note, by reason of their likenels in manners, lived together in great love and Giode Repub. friendship : So that the Poet seems to me to have conceived in his mind the Idea of those Aug. de Civ. times, when he faid, The Roman State was upheld by men and manners of the old Fashion. Pyrhus Det. 2, 21 ferioufly confidering and pondering these things, was inflamed with a great defire of composing all Fustin, 18.1 differences with this Nation, and immediately reftored two hundred of the Captives without Plutareb Ransome, and gave leave likewise to all the rest to go to Rome and visit their friends at the Feast Pyrrho c.44 of Saturn now approaching, relying only on the word of Fabricius, who promifed, That when the Holy-dages were past they should return, unlesse peace were in the mean time

And fuch was the Gravity of the Senate 4 and the Edelity of every fingle Person, that at a Day by the Fathers appointed, they every man redelivered themselves up to Pyrrhus, having Fullyium. in vain urged their Country-mens obstinate minds to Articles of Peace. For the Crafty King, Florus 1, 18,14 thinking this to be a nick of time for his purpole, while the Romans being mollified with the fight of their dearest friends; and desirous of retaining them, might happily be the more ready to lay down all thoughts of harred and hostility, resolved now to send an Embassage to Rome to Treat of Peace on those Conditions he had propounded to Fabricius in Person. Romans had taken away from the Samnites, Apulians, Lucanians and Brutians might be reflored : and in Lien, the Romans should receive their Captives without Ransom. Cineas of whom men. tion hath formerly been made, was at that time with Pyerhus, a man as of great knowledg in Civil affairs, fo of very honest principles, and who had by exercise improved his natural wit to a marvellous eloquence: For these his qualities he was very dear to the King, who often acknowledged . He had won more Cities by the Eloquence of Cineas, then by his own Armes. This man being fent Embaffador to Rome, with much cunning delay'd making his addresse to the Senate, till he had in Pyrrhus his name distributed many gifts in the houses of the principal men. Being then brought into the Court, when he had in many words, Extolled the virtue of Pyrihus, and his inclination towards the Romans, he discoursed of the Equity of the conditions he brought, infomuch that great part of the Senate were moved to accept them: because befides other conveniencies, he promifed. If they would defift molefting his friends he would furnish them with aid sufficient for the Conquest of all the rest of Italy. But, because the Consultation lasted many dayes (the Fathers being very solicitous in a business of so great consequence) and thereby a suspicion and rumor was spread, that peace would be concluded. Appins Claudius, who by reason of his Age and blindness, had of a long time been absent from the Senate, caused himself now to be carried thither in his Litter, where he no sooner appeared, but his fons and fons in law with all Reverence and Duty receiving him, conducted him to a place becoming his Dignity. and with the respect they bore his person, and expecting for what cause, after so long absence and retirement he should now come into the Senate: he beginning his discourse with the afflicti-Appianus apud on of his fickness, faid, 'His Blindness had indeed hitherto been very grievous to him, but now he was not only delighted in it, left he should behold those things which were doing, but was ' forry that his eares also were not deaf, that he might not hear things so fordid and unworthy the name of the Romans. For what is become of your noble minds? whither are your 'spirits fallen? Ye were wont to be of opinion, when ye heard the Fame of Alexander the " Macedonian renowned as of an invincible King, that his glory was more to be imputed to his 'Fortune then his Virtue: that if the Fates had allotted him a Roman War, both the event and likewife his efteem amongst men, would have proved far different. But now, behold how 'ye are degenerated from that your Magnanimity; ye once thought ye were able to conquer the Macedonians, and now ye stand in fear of Molossians and Chaosians, the perpetual prey of the Macedonians. Ye once contemned Alexander, and now are frighted by Pyrrhus, not the fervant of Alexander, but his fervants fervant, who flying from his old enemies rather then feeking new, is come over into Italy with a resolution, should it please the gods, to obtain the Empire of Rome, with those forces wherewith he was not able to keep and defend his 'little share of Macedonia. Unless therefore we fend him back well beaten, laden with great misfortune, affure your felves, any other Party, defervedly flighting and fcorning our Power, will greedily venture into Italy, as to a prey ready prepared to their hands. For what can be thought of us, but that we are a cowardly flothful people, if Pyrrhus, being received into friendship, shall carry back a Reward for that Difgrace he hath done us, in as much as by his means it is come to pass that the Romans are become a Laughing-stock to the Tarentines and Samnites?

This was the main scope of Appins his Oration, which did so inflame the minds of all the Senators, that, following him the Author of a fevere Sentence, they with one confent decreed,

That the War Sould be prosecuted, that Cineas Sould the Same day depart the City, that Pytrhus Bould be given to understand, That neither he should be admitted into the City, (for that also was defired) neither would they so much as treat of friendship and society, till he had quitted Italy. A like fad decree by Appins his motion was made concerning the Captives, That they

Sould not be led in War against Pyrthus, neither sould they any where be joyned in the same company, but that being fent to several Garrisons, they sould, as a note of infamy, change their manner of fighting, that they who before served on horse-back, should now be listed among the foit, and they who were of the Legions, should now serve in light armature; That no man should recover his former order, till be had brought in the fpoil of two enemies. 'Tis reported, when the Embassadors returned with this sharp answer, the King altonish'd at the wonderful constancy

of the Romans, asked, What they thought of the City and of the Senate? and that Cineae

There being now no hopes of peace, they converted all their thoughts to War, and busied themselves on both sides all winter in making diligent preparations. Thefe I take to be the Times wherein Pyrrhu is reported, (for the avoiding the Dangers of shipwrack, and a more convenient paffage of the Italian and Epirot Succours one to the other) to have had thoughts of making Bridges between Hydruns, where Italy gets farthest into the fea, and Apollonia, a Town scituate on the adverse shore , some fifty miles diftant : For that is the Bredth of the Sea in those places between the Gracian and Italian shoares. M. Terentins Varro is faid afterward to have made the like Attempt, when, being Cn. Magnut his Lieu-

The Romans were troubled with remembrance of the former Battell wherein Pyrrhus was victorious: The Epirots were daunted at the Roman obdinacy, but chiefly at the name of the other Confull, fo fatall to the Enemies Legions: For it was given out that P. Decins after the Example of his Father and Grandfather would purchase the Victory with his Death; and the issue of those Battells wherein they died, did make the expectation of the Decian Devotion to be terrible to all

delutions, then with true causes of feare, he shewed that this feare might be prevented, by flewing the Habit wherein the former Decii had Devoted themselves, and warning the soul-. diers if they met any Man in the like accourrement not to affault him with any weapon, but where the Chariots were prepared against them, they frighted the horse (even as it hapned in the Fight is much different from that of the former, for some Authors affirm, The Ro-

The number of the flain is likewise expressed, That on Pyrrhus his fide twenty thousand Plutarch on the Romans fide five thouland were wanting , that the King with a dart foot through his arm Florus. 1.18 Orofins 4.1 was grievously wounded, and that in vain endeavouring to flay the flight of his men, was by his Life-quard brought out of the field one of the laft; that on his fide three and fifty Colours mere loft, on the Romans eleven, and that Fabricius the other Confuls Lieutenant was likewife wear-Austinius. ded. But contrariwife, others fay, This Battel had the like event with the former, though the Romans by reason of the vicinity of their Camps sustained not so much loss; but that they did confes-Plutarch sedly fly and loft fix thousand men; that Pyrrhus loft three thousand five hundred and five as is in the Kings Chronicles registred by the Testimony of Hieronimus. And not only variety but Repugnancy of Authors moves me rather to incline to those who Livie Epic. 13 report the event of this Battel to have been doubtfull: for 'tis ordinary after an equal encounter for each part to attribute the victory to themselves, which by the negligence or impudence of others is committed to writing, doing very ill to deliver to Posterity for true and undoubted. those things which are grounded on Idle report only, or for affection are partially related. Wherefore their history seemes more probable who affirmes, That there was but one Fight neere Asculum, and that, after an hot dispute and much blood shed, the Sun being now set, the Kings wound and the loffe of the Baggage did with much ador breake off the fight: That then both Armies founded a Retreat , when on both fides there were flaine about fifteene thousand: and that this was the time when Pyrthus answer'd one who congratulated his victory, If the Romans are thus to be Vanquished we are undone our selves. And indeed the sequel confirmes this Opinion. for Pyrrhus retired to Turentus, and the Confuls, making no pursuite after the enemie, diffributed their forces into winter quarters in Apulsa, whereas the time of yeare gave them leave and Reasons of War might well have perswaded them, to have prosecuted so glorious a victory.

Moreover I find not that these Consuls made any Triumph, and many think that P. Decime in this Battel devoted himselfe, who dying as did his Father and Grandfather, yielded himself the Third facrifice, without intermission out of the same family, for the good of the Commonwealth: Which as I had no thoughts to gain-fay, So should I not have related in the general silence of all Historys, but that a grave Author M. Tullim Cierro in his bookes of Phylosophy Tufcul.queft. 1.13 de Finibus 2.19 more then once maketh mention of it. . The fight at Asculum thus ended, the rest of the yeare was quiet and free from all warlike Expeditions, only the whole time fpent in Confultation and preparations. Pyrrisu , having lost most of his old forces, friends, and Commanders, sent into Epirus with order for a supply of Men and money for next spring. But before that Navy Plutarch could be fet forth new hopes arifing alter'd the Kings Counfels. Pyrrhus had fometime the poffer Zonaras sion of Macedonia, wrelling it out of the hands of Demetrius, and again lost it by the Power of Pint. Pyrrho Lesimachus . Now while Pyrrhus waged war in Italy , Prolomaus Ceraunus being slaine by C-20,24

lest it should be obnoxious to the injurys of the Gaules who now oppressed the Neighbour nation Macedonia. But Pyrrhus did not as then steere his Course homeward, being upon other Occasions (as shall be related) call'd into Sicily. The winter being past over in these Cares the New Confuls came to the Army C. Fabricius Luscinus, and Q. Amilius Papus (who before had born a Confulship together) which Pyribus understanding drew forth his forces, intending to observe the Marches and Counsels of his enemy. Their Camps being not far diftant, there hapned an Accident very remarkable, and by most men related much after the same manner; One Timechares an Ambracian, who held a good honourable place in the Kings Agellius 2.8 favour, fecretly came to Fabricius, and promifed him, if he would give him an answerable re-Cic.de Offic. ward to Poylon the King; which he thought was easie for him to accomplish by his sons, who 3 2 2. Val. Maximus. were Cup-bearers to the King. Fabricius, no way delighted with the Treason, informed the 6.5,1 Zonaras Senate of it, the Senate, not discovering the Treason of Timochrares, who had (by what means foever) intended the Roman profit, fent Embaffadors to Pyrrhus, who should only in general Agellius warn him, That he should look well about him, and take heed of what mens service he made use of Livie 39 51 Agellius and enquire into their faithfulness and honesty. Thus Valerius Antius relates the business. But Ammian, Mar-Claudius Quadrigarius in flead of Timochares make Niceas the undertaker of this Poyloning, cel 30.5 and that notice was given not by the Senate but by the Confuls, reciting also the Letter of the Tacitus 1 Consuls, wherein they discover Niceas his design, That they are unwilling to fight by craft, or Plusarch Pyrrho c.45 with mony, and wish the King safe from Treason, hoping he will become an Illustrious Orna-& in Apophment to their Victory and Triumph

Some Report it was the Kings Physician who treated with Fabrician either in person or by Letter, and that upon his discovery, he was hang'd. As there may be doubt in these Circumstances, fo no question they are deceived who say that Curius fent back the Physician to the King. Tis faid that Pyrrhus at this time wondring at the Experience of fo great Ventue in Enemies, cry'd out, This is that Fabricius, who can with no leffe difficulty swerve from the Rules of Justice and Honesty, then the Sun be turned one of his Course. He did immediately, lest he should be Overcome with Kindnesse, return the Romans all the prisoners he had, and sent Cineas again to obtaine peace and friendship. It seemed dishonourable to receive a gift from the enemie, whereby they might be thought to have abhorred wickednesse more for gain then for the love of Vertue, they therefore fent back an equal number of Tarentines and Samnites that their captives might not be received gratis. This publick abstinence was to their greater Credit seconded by the vertue and resolution of private persons, when the gists of Pyrrhus (which Cineas in Livie, 34.4 great Number and those very pretious had Carried to Rome for both sexes) were refused not fullings, only by the Men but by the women. For when upon the refusal of some, he profer'd them to Val Maximus. others, and others again, there was not fo much as one man or woman to be found so mean or 43.14 others, and others again, coverous as to open a door for the Receipt of a Kings gift. The Former answer was now again returned to the Embassadours, That until Pyrrhus had quitted Italy, they would esteem him an Enemie to the people of Rome. While Pyrrhus was much perplexed at these passages, not knowing how to profecute the War with any cheerefulneffe, nor willing to depart Italy with any loffe Apple of Reputation. the Sicilian affaires did feem to help him, the management whereof (after long and doubtfull deliberation) he refolved to undertake. For so he thought the Roman war might with credit be declined, and the command of a most Rich Island obtained, he had also an earnest defire of being revenged on the Carthaginians, as being first provoked by Justin, 18.2 them. For they suspecting the Kings designs, had a little before hand sent Mago with a Navy Val. Max. 3.7 of an hundred and twenty ships, saying, The Romans ought by Forreigne aid to be affifted against Livie Epit. 13 a forreign enemy. And though the Romans used not their affiltance, making answer, That they were not wont to undertake any War but what could be managed by their own forces; Yet now this fourth time was the League renewed between the two Commonwealths. To the former Articles it was added, That whether the Romans or Carthaginians made peace with Pyrthus, it should be specially excepted, that they might affift one the other, which soever of them were provoked to War; And, that when either had need of the others help, the Carthaginians should provide ships, each party pay their own souldiers, the Carthaginians aid the Romans Austinius. by fea, but not be compelled against their wills out of their ships. Which being agreed upon , Mago went to Pyrrhus under pretence of treating of peace, but indeed to discover the Kings Counsels. whom the Carthaginians had understood to be invited into Sicily: And they offer'd their Navy to the Romans not fo much out of any good will or care of their fafety, but further to involve Pyrrhus in his Italian War, left he should spoil their successes in Sicily which flou- Diodori Eclos. rished so prosperously. They had then also guarded the passage into Sieily with a numerous book 22 fleet, pretending the fiege of Rhegium, but indeed refolving to hinder Pyrrhus from transmitting his Army. For these causes did he wholly apply his mind to the Sicilian affairs, which filled him with great hope, as by the state of things, so by the frequent Embassies which came one after another out of the Island, affirmed, That he was defired by the prayers of all men, as the only remedy of their calamities wherewith they were more sharply afflitted then the most miserable Nation under the heavens. For after the death of Agathocles, more lamentable then undefery- Diadori Eclog. ed, one Mano, born at Egefta, a City of Sicily, who had poison'd the King, endeavouring b.21 to usurp the government, was by Hiceras the Pretor expelled the City, and fled to the Cartha-

These two along Livie 25 24 time contested, Thenio possessing Najus, an Island which is part of Syracuse, Sosistratus exercifing the Tyranny in the other parts of the City. When at length by these discords they faw nothing but defiruction likely to enfue, with one confent they decreed to fend for Pyrrhus, who being the fon in law of Agathocles, and next in succession, as having a son by Dioderus Lanaffa, was thought fittest to bear rule, as being able by his courage and his forces to settle Appianus apud their affairs. Moreover, the principal men of Agrigentum and Leontium, offering the Go- Fulviam urf. vernment of their Cities, and confequently of the whole Island, unanimoully intreated him, Plutarch To come into Sicily as foon as may be, to succour them with his presence, being wearied with la- luftin, 18,2 bouring under the heavy burden of a Barbarous flavery. Pyrrhus therefore without delay sendeth Ciness before (whose wisdom and faith he much trusted to) to agree upon Conditions and Appian Articles of friendship with the Sicilian Cities. stance on those conditions he was call'd in , or that at least he would leave their City free. They could obtain neither, Pyrrhus returning no other answer, but commanding them, To tarry his leisure. The Epirot King being thus imploy'd, the Confuls had the easier war against their other enemies. I find they had about this time good success against the Etrurians, Lucanians, Brutians and Samnites. It appears there was no great matter done against the Etrurians, in that Livit Epi. 13 , there was no Triumph made for that war, neither was the whole nation, but few Cities engaged, who re-affumed against the Romans those arms they had so lately laid down, being solicited by the Samnites; who found themselves left naked by the departure of Pyrrhats. HILE these things were doing in Italy , Pyrrhus having shipp'd his Army and Elephants, failed from the Tarentine Port into Sicily, after he had continued two years and four moneths in Italy. Being conducted by Thanio, who met him with his Navy, he was received by the Sicilians with wonderful chearfulness, freely delivering up into his hands their Towns, their Forces, their Mony and their Ships. Being thus in a short time possess'd of the dominion of the Gracian Cities, he did also by force of arms extort from the Carthaginians all whatfoever they held, excepting only the City of Lilybaum, which the Carthaginians being helped by its convenient scituation, defended against all his assauls. Whence justly conceiving great and vast hopes in his mind, he resolved, leaving his eldest son the Patrimony of his Father, to fettle the other two, the one King of Italy, the other King of Sicily. Both the reputation and virtues of this King were indeed at that time very great; and the Sicilians having for many years sustained both forreign and civil wars, and a plague worse then both, the tyranny of usurpers, seemed willing with joy to entertain any indifferent Prince over them. But when, a little after, he proceeded to raise moneys against their wills, and put to death some of their Nobles, he contracted much hatred, which was encreased by the covetousness and arrogance of ·his Officers, whose vices did every where as much wrong him as his own; therefore next to the first and principal care Kings ought to have, of being themselves Egregiously good, 'tis for their honour and fafety to make a choice of virtuous Favourites, feeing private men are blamed only for their own faults, but other mens crimes are imputed to Princes. things hapned afterwards. Now at Present, while their Zeal was hot, he was with the highest Honour and magnificence received, first by Tyndarion Prince of the Taurominitans (for in that part of the Island he landed) then by the People of Catanaa, and to passed with his foot-Army to Syracuse: His fleet he commanded to be brought about not farre from the shore, ready prepared for fight, as thinking the Carthaginians would not fuffer him to approach the City without hazard of a Battell. But it hapned, that a little before Thirty of the Carthaginian thios were upon other Employment gone from the Navy, which because they were not return'd the Admirall refused to venture on the Fight with the Rest. Wherefore Entring without Refiftance, Thanson and Pififtratus yielding Poffession, he took into his hands the Publick Trea-Diodorus fure, an hundred and twenty Covered ships, Twenty open ones, their Weapons, Engines, and all other Furniture for Warre. In the Interim came Embassadours from the Leontines, whose Prince Heraclidas offered the City and all his Forces, Four thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse. Neither were other Cities flower in their submission, but came in driven as it were by a Torrent of Fortune. Pyrthus treating them all with much Humanity, and gaining their Good wills, fent every one back to his own City, entertaining now more Ample Hopes in his mind, intending if affaires proceed fo favourably to pass over into Africke. Things went not so well with his Confederaces in Diedori

Italy, for Milo, who was left at Tarentus with part of the Army, was not able to protect them Eclaphaza from the hostility of the Romans, now in the absence of the King and his main strength. But Zonaras. as yet it was well for them that the Romans deferring a while the Tarrentine warre . both the Confulls converted their forces against Samnium. The Samnites (seeing their Fields burn't their Castles surprized, the whole burthen of the Warre to fall on them, and that they were for faken by their Friends) being inferiour both in strength and Courage, for faking their Townes and Villages, betook themselves to the high and craggy Mountaines, carrying with them their Wives and Children, and what things of most value they could in such a Tumult and seare convey away. Among the Romans belides the Emulation of their Commanders, there was arisen great Negligence and Carelefnes (the Inseparable Companion of Prosperity) caused by their own Constant good success, and their Enemies Fear. Hereby they suffered some Loss and more Difgrace; for their fouldiers confidently creeping up craggy and difficult passages were beaten back and destroy'd by the Samnites, who had possess destroyed by the Samnites, who had possess destroyed by the Samnites and possess destroyed by

This Accident caused the Commanders to divide their Forces, for each laying the blame of the Missortune upon his Colleague, boasted he could have managed the business with better success if he had been alone. C. Junius with his Legions remained in Samnium, P. Cornelius drew out his forces against the Lucanians and Brutians; where carrying about the Terrour of his Armes, wasting the Grounds and burning the Villages, he had occasion offer'd of greater Attempts. In the utmost parts of the Italian shore, towards the East and the Jonian sea, where the promontory of Lacinum stretcheth forth it selfe, is seated Croton of old very famous, and now

But it hapned about that time that either out of fear of the Enemies Neighbourhood, or suspicion of Treason, which is seldom long hid, the Crotonians had procured aid from Mile: Nicke- Fronting machus came to them with a strong band of Lucanians, who issuing out upon the Consult (not Stratgerm 3.6.

These things thus transacted, he sent to Syracuse for all forts of weapons and engines which were of use in the siege of Cities. For now his design was to assault the Cities under the Cartha-

The first he tooke was Heraclea, where was a Punick garrison, then Azona; After which the Selinuntians, Halicyzans, and Ageltians following his fortune for fook the Carthaginian party, giveing an Example to many other Townes in the same quarter of doing the like. The Erycines confiding in the number of their Auxiliaries and strength of the place, he was resolved with all his power to affault, having therefore order'd his men . himselfe armed , coming up toward the walls . Vowed a Vow to Hercules if that day he should manifest himself to the Gracians a Warriour worthy of the Race he came of and the office he bore. After the figne was given, and that the defendants, with a cloud of arrowes being driven from their stations, gave way to the placeing ladders upon the walls, the King himselfe sirst of all men entred into a most noble fight against all opposers, sumbling some down with his sheild, slaying others with his sword, and terrifying all with the greatnesse of his Courage and strength; neither was this fight more glorious to him, then in every consideration prosperous; for without receiving any wound, with great honour he gained the Citie at that one florm, his fouldiers being no leffe animated by his Example then fearefull of his danger, for both which reasons they sought with the greater contention. He then did sacrifice to Hereales according to his vow, and for many days exhibited Plays and Shows of feverall kinds in great Magnificence and Pompe. In this year I find there was a Triumph at Rome over the Lucanians and Brutians before the Nones of Ianuary. But I wonder to find it afcribed to C. The Plague likewife committed great flaughter amongst them, taking away man and beast by a common Murrain; but was most formidable in Aborsions, for there was no young ones almost of man or beaft which came forth fafe and entire, infomuch as it was believed the anger of the gods would confume all living creatures. Which Affliction made the other Confulthin of 2. Fabius Maximus Gurges very famous, wherein he had C. Genussus Clepsina for his Colleague. And yet they left not off their war against the Samnites and Lucanians, and two certain arsuments there are that they made great flaughter of their enemies, for the fame year Q. They were useerly undone without speedy help; that they could no longer suffuin the power of the Romans, but must of necessity prevent the netermost extremity by yielding up themselves. This thing much inclined Pyrrhus to depart the Island and transport his forces again into Italy, feeing also his affairs now to be more difficult in Sicily, by reason the affections of men grew cold; and, by the consideration of fome injuries received, were turned into harred against him. Which his resolution, and the series of emuing affairs, that they may the better be under-

When therefore he had poffeiled himself of Eryx, and placed a Garison in it, the marched to the City of the Egins which is of a very convenient scienation, near the Haven of Panormus, and well fenced with works; there being received with the good will of the Citizens, he removed his

Polybius 1.56 ethto it: This he rook by force, and having likewise taken a place called Epirete, seated in Dionyl spud a pleasant mountain, but upon hard passages, between Panormus and Eryx, he had now the Valipum Disseri Eclog possession of all the Carthaginian Province, excepting only Lilybaum. This City was lately built by the Carthaginians, as an habitation for the Mortians, whole town Dionyling the Tyrant had in the Punick War demolished. Wherefore the Carthaginians, seeing that of all their dominions in Sicily, their hopes were confin'd to this only place, refolved with their utmost firength to defend it against the preparations they understood Pyrrbus made for the fiege of it. Wherefore bringing in thither a confiderable strength of Souldiers, with plentiful provision, as likewise amusition of all forts (which they had opportunity enough to do, having the command of the feas) they diligently adhibited all care possible to fence it on every side : Especially where it lay open to the land they erected many Forts and Towers, encompassed with large dirche: Their work was the fooner finished, in regard the town being for the most part of it built upon the Rocks of the fea, needed no artificial Bulwarks in those places. But the Kings friends, and the Sicilian Princes enforming him , That fo long as the Tyrrho c. 1.50 Carthaginians held Lilybæum, (as a ladder ready prepared whereby to scale all the rest of Sici-Iv) the Illand would never be woid of the fear of them; caused him to return answer, That there was but this one condition of peace he would agree to, to wit, That they should clearly quit Sicily, and suffer the sea to be the bounds of either's dominions. The hopes of peace being thus broken off, he draweth his forces forthwith toward the City, and Marshalling his army not far from the walls. in fuch order as those who were tired might (by turns) be relieved by fresh men, he began the affault. But the Lilybætans having a sufficient number of souldiers to defend them and being provided of Engines and Amunition kept the City fafe. For the Carthaginians had brought in so many Catapults and Scorpians that the whole compasse of the walls was not able to receive them. When therefore a shower of all forts of weapons and darts overwhelmed the Kings Men. flay-

felfe to work to make Engines of Battery , belide those he brought from Syracule and digging Mines under ground, he attempted all arts belonging to a fiege: But the Carthaginians froutly relifting, when he had for almost two months wearied himself in vaine, and faw that the belieged having free egresse and regresse at sea, the Citie could not be taken, he broke up his siege and employ'd his forces other where. For some Greek Cities, besides other heavy oppressions, being compelled to pay tribute, implored his affiltance against the Mamertines, living upon Plutarell the fea coaft. Pyrrhus therefore leading his Army in halt, when he had taken and flain fome polybing 1.4 Mamertines he found gathering Taxes in those places; Encountring their main body proved Plutarch Conquerour, and took by force and demolish'd many of their Garrison. And hitherto the King by his Illustrious performances had obtained great Power and Honour having beside his other Vertues, with his fingular Humanity not only work, but deferved the Love and Affections of the Cities. But this fo great Falicity, which one would think fo firmely grounded, was in a Ferellin Hill. moment deftroy'd, as by that Levity of Mind which was never wanting in this people, and by Sicacca, b. the Intemperance of his friends, so chiefely by the Kings own fault. Who, being in advertity irreprehentibly good, was puffed up with pride in his prosperity, in which Condition Mens minds are indeed generally found to be weakelt. When therefore, as we have faid, he efteemed a Fleet necessary for the accomplishment of his undertaking, and that though he had many thips, werthey were not well furnished with Sea men, he very much offended the City with a Plutarch strict Press of Sea men; being now on a sudden changed, and from his former gentleness proceeding to proud commands, threats and extreme punishments; these things nevertheless were tolerated, as having the pretence of publick good. But, when they faw those very men to be flain, by whose good with and affistance chiefly he had obtained Sicily, many people, not by degrees, or interpoling delayes, but on the fudden changing their minds, revoked from his friendthip, and applied themselves (as for every one was most opportune) some to the Carthagimians, fome to the Mamerrines. So that cruelty, which when it is alone is alwayes grievous, doth then become utterly intolerable, when being exercised against the well-deserving, it contracteth (beside the hatred properly due to it self) the detestation of an unthankful and persidious mind. He feemeth to have brought himself to this necessity of governing by violence, being too much over-ruled by the naughty Affections and counsels of his own men, for unto them (being no whit better), did he beltow the riches which were fequelited from the friends and kinimen of Agathocles. between Right and Wrong. Mens mindes being hereby it cenfed they begun firsto murmur afterward openly to Complain, why they had repented of their former Condition, if now the very same things were to be born withall? that in vain was Pyrrhus invited and received, if he studied to imitate those manners be came to punish; that no injury can possibly be of so Barp seme and Apprehension, as that whereof he is the Author who ought to have been the Avenger. And now many began not very obscurely to move sedition, and cause a Revolution of things, whereas he hearkning to pernicious Counsell, chose rather to encrease causes of Offence, then take them away: as if what evil was by Injuffice committed, were by Cruelty to be mended. In the meane time the Carthaginians, observing that Pyrrbus was not very strong in his own Country forces, and was daily less affected by the Sicilians, conceiving hopes of recovering their loft Province, had fent over an new Army which found business enough for the Epirots, many flying over to them who flood in fear of Pyrchu's cruelty. Thanso was flain, Sofiftratus fled to the enemy, affording him no leffe help and authority to the cafting Pyrrhus out of Sicily, then he had before to the bringing him in and confirming him

Upon this many Cities revolting, greater part to the Carthaginians, fome to the Mamertines, Pyrhus his affairs were reduced from a most flourishing Condition to a very narrow and evil state, In this Conjuncture the embassage of his Italian confederates came not unwelcome to him, complaining, That haveing lost all things, they had very sew Cities lest which were able with much add to keep the Enemy from entring their walls. This gave him a faire and honourable Pretence of departing, that he might feeme, not expelled out of Sicily by the Carthaginians, But to return into Italy for the Relief of his oppressed associates. Being now just going, when he feriously considered the scituation and wealth of the Island, and disposition of the Inhabitants, O (faith he) what a fair field do we leave the Romans and Carthaginians to fight in for Superiority 1 And his Prefage proved true, as was witneffed by the wars suddenly ensuing, wherein so many Navies were destroyed, and Armies routed.

But the Enemies Courage increasing with their Fortune, Pyrehus had neither a safe depar-Paufan, b. 1 ture out of Sicily, nor a quiet Voyage to the Tarentines in Italy. The Carthaginians affaulting him in his Passage cross the sea, sunk seventy of his ships, and made the rest useless (the Epirots almost utterly unskilful in Maritine affaires, being not able to grapple with men of such Experience therein) so he fled out of the Fight with Twelve ships into Italy, who had come thence, with above an hundred, besides a greater number of ships of Burthen. But gathering together those souldiers who made a shift from the Overthrow to escape to shore, he had presently a strength so great that he conceived hopes of taking Rhegium by storme. But being beaten off by the Campanians who defended it, he prefently fell into a great danger. For Pyrrho.c. 53 as he led his Army through blind and difficult passages, the Enemy out of Ambush fell upon his Reare, and flew a great Number of his Men, with two Elephants. Twas no contemptible force, neither for Number nor the quality of the Warriours, which thus affaulted him, they were little less then ten thousand old fouldiers, most of them Mamertines, who trusting in their friendship and cognition with the Rhegians, having understood that Pyrrhus intended to return for Italy, had croffed the sea before him, and in hope of prey had privily disposed of themselves in advantageous places to make a sudden irruption upon him.

Pyrrhus, according to his wonted Boldnesse fighting in the front of his Battel, received a wound in his head, which when he was gone afide to drefs, one of the enemies of large flature, and gallant in his Armour, advancing before the rest of his Fellows, Challeng'd him with a loud Voice, bidding him, If he were a live, to come forth. Pyrrhus burning with anger, and Terrible in Countenance, the blood running about his face, his men not being able to hold him, made a sudden assault upon him, and with a blow on his head struck him to the ground. 'Tis reported, his fword was so well temper'd and his Arme so strong, that at one stroke he cleft the Man in funder even from the head to the bottom of his body, his parts on each fide divided falling to the ground. The enemie terrified with the strange novelty of this spectacle, and admitting him as above the ordinary Ranke of Men, left off the fight. Pyrrbus, being rid of this trouble, had notwithstanding little joy. For, inastruuch as he now lost part of his Carriages, and that the wealth he had gather d by the spoils of the Sicilians, was lost in his last fight with the Carthaginians, he was in great want of moneys, fo that his fouldiers murmuring for pay, knowing not how elfewhere to provide it, he was compell'd to feize upon the Treasury of Proferpine: Her Church at Locri was in those dayes most famous for the Reputation of its holine's; which town, when Pyrrbus had taken by the affiltance of his faction within it, he committed many horrid facts by flaughter and rapine, more then the just revenge of his slain Garrison did require. But there being nothing left which men would or could contribute to him, he laid hands on the holy money, being urged thereunto by his worft friends, who had most commonly been the authors of every pernicious counsel : These were Evagorus the son of These rus, Balacer the fon of Nicandar, and Dinarchus the fon of Niceas. They did not only per-

Pyrrbus rejoycing faid, there is nothing more foolifb then un "AGoar@ scalonable Devotion, and not to accept of Money ready prepar'd to one's hand is the part of a mad appian man. Nevertheles, henceforward he had no wageaflaste. better success, Fortune Eluding all his Designes whatsoever, even those which were upon Hey@ good advice, and Virtuoully undertaken. Which he did alwayes after constantly impute to the Living Anger of the Offended Goddess, as Proximus the writer of his History, and himself in his Commentary do affirme; and when the thing was newly done, not being able by many Sacrifices to Appian make propitiation to Proferpina, he put to death all the Authors of that unhappy Counfell, the instruments of the Fact, and every one who had but lightly consented to the Commission of it. And these being executed according to their Deserts, Pyrrhus prosecuting his De-Plutarch fign had afterward a quiet journey to Tarentus; The Romans being still more afflicted with Pyrths c. 53. the Plague, and fearing a new war upon Pyrrbue his return into Italy, attempted all Meanes both Divine and Humane for their Reliefe. Twas an old opinion, that the Peftilence might be stayed by the Dictatours strikeing in of a Naile; for the Experiment of which hopes tis Livie 7.3. probable that P. Cornelius R. ufinus was chosen Dictatour, for as the greatness of the Calamity Pighius in might well provoke them to try all Remedies, fo we find that Rufinus was the year after taken Annal. Romanis notice of by the Cenfours, when he had been twice Confull and twice Dictatour, neither can there be found a more certain monument of, or a more convenient place for that his Dictatourship. Against the fickness providing what Remedy they could, their Chiefest care and diligence was required in matter of Armes, especially in regard of the Difficulty in raising Men. For besides the length of the Warre, the continuance of the Pestulence had made men weary of entring into action, infomuch as the young Men did with wonderful Obstinacy decline the fervice. But the leverity and conftancy of M. Curius Dentatus the second time Confull overcame this their wilfulness, for he now had entred the Magistracy with L. Cornelius Lenen-Ins his Colleague: When therefore in the Capitoll he first began his Leavy, because no man answered, he caused the names of all the Tribes to be cast into an Urne, and the Pollian Tribe Varro in Sapra coming out first, he caused the first man of that Tribe whose name was drawn to be summon'd . The Tribunes nevertheless did not relieve him, and afterward the example being judged very wholesom grewinto Custome that when a Leavy was rightly and duly made, he who would not be a fouldier should be fold for a flave. Others being terrified by this Precedent did the more readily give in their Names, and having filled up their Legions both the Confulls marched into the Enemies Country; Lentulus into Lucania, Curius into Samnium. Pyrrbus having intelligence of their motion, mu-Resed his army at Tarentus, and found himself almost twenty Thousand strong in Foot, toge- Pyrthe. (4.

With these and the choice young men of the Tarentines he entred Samnium, but found not the Inhabitants so obediens as heretofore, they came not in so freely and readily as they had done, not only because their courage was over-wearied with the great and many losses they had fultained, but because they were jultly exasperated, imputing all their calamities to Pyrrbus, which they had not suffered, had not he by his departure into Sicily betraid his Italian affociates. Nevertheless he gathered together so great a strength, that he sent one part into Lucania to buse the other Conful, while himself encountred Man. Chusing therefore out of his Army those who were most forward, he resolved to assault the Roman Camp in the night time, when he might not be discovered. But while he prepared all things for his intended purpose, he Dion. spud fell into a deep fleep and dreamt, that the greater part of his Teeth fell out, and that an abundance of blood flowed out of his mouth; in confideration whereof being much perplex'd, he intended to defift from his enterprize; but his friends earnestly perswading him, Lest he should Culverius Italia never again have she same opportunity offer'd him, he gave order to advance. M. deventum (for that was the name of it in those dayes) are Mountainous and Woody places which by degrees firetching themselves into somewhat more even ground, at length end in a very fair and open plain which is called by the name of the Taurafine Fields. Now Pyrrhu beginning his journey from the Lower grounds up to the hills and woods, when his lights failed was wildred for want of knowledg in the wayes, in fo much that (the day breake. ing) he was discovered from the Roman camp. The Romans being moved at the unexpected approach of the enemie, yet, (because there was no doubt made but fight they must, and their factifices now proveing more favourable) with the Confull's conduct cheerefully iffued out and falling upon the foremost of the enemy, (who were far from the Main body, and not in very good order) drove them backward, killing no small number of men, and taking some Elephants which the enemy left behind. This successe encouraged Curius, to follow his Fortune and descend into the open field in Battel-aray prepared to fight. Neither did the Epirots make any delay. The encounter was very fierce and furious on both fides, but the Romans having had the upper hand in the late skirmish, were much fuller of Courage and hopes. The Epirots giving back, Pyrrhus now again fought Refuge from his Elephants, and thereby (one of his own wings flying) he forced one of the Romans Wings to retire even to their Reference There had the Conful placed a strong force (resolving upon this occasion to engage himself) which he commanded, being now fresh, to renew the fight, and beat back the Elephants. Former experience had taught them an easie and ready way to oppose these beafts, that they were fooner diverted by fire then the fword: Against them therefore were provided Iron instruments involved in much Pitch and Tar, which, being fet on fire, were darted upon the backs and Towers of the Elephants, and whether they light on the skin of the beafts, or on the wood of the tumult, at length the rest were all in consusion and turned into slight. Very remarkable was this fight, both for the number of the flain and the fruit of the victory. For Pyrrhus being hereby utterly overthrown, neither did the rest of Italy long hold out, neither, after Italy, was any other Nation and King able to it and against them. Tis faid the King in that Battel had was any other example in the house of the control of the number of the Roman, even four foot thouland foot, and fix thousand horse, of these they who report the most say, fix and thirty thousand were slain, they who report the seast, Frontinus Aras. fay fix and twenty thousand; thirteen hundred were taken prisoners, and eight Elephants, Psyrbus with a few horimen escaped to Tarentus. But most remarkable was Cornelius Rufinus his note of Infamy, who having been twice Conful and twice Dictator, was ejected the Senate by the Cenfors, and this reason given of his Punishment, That they found in his house the weight of ten pounds in plate to ferve at meals: And in this Condition not only himself but his Family for a long time remained, whereof not any one attained to the highest honours, before Sylla the Dictator. Such was the Parlimony of this Citie in those dayes, and afterward fo great the extravagancy,

estate being cessed and valued, the Army was purged by sacrifices; there were cessed two hundred seventy one thousand, two hundred twenty four Citizens. Both Confuls entred the Capitoll in triumph, first Curius, whose triumph was the more illustrious, as for the same of his Exploits, and great joy of his victory, so did it exceed in Pomp and splendour. For heretofore their triumphs being over poor People their neighbours, were fet out only with broken armes and Gallick waggons, nor any spoiles led but flockes and herds of Cattel But now there was a worthy shew both for the varietie of Nations which were led Captive before the Chariot, and for the Beauty and Magnificence of the spoyls. Epirots, Thessalians. Macedonians, Apulians, Lucanians, Brutians were led Bound, there were carried Painted Tables, the works of choice and rare Artificers, Gold, Purple, with other beyond fea rarietie, and sences de Brev. the instrument of the Tarentine Luxury. But the most wonderful and joyful spectacle were the Elephants with their four Towers on their backs. (for the rest were dead of their wounds) This was the first time they were ever seen at Rome; the common people called them Luca-Bulls, giving them their name from the creature they were hitherto best acquainted with, and their denomination from the place they first faw them in , within few dayes after was the other Confulls Triumph nothing to gallant, though his performances were not to be despited; he had overthrown the Samnites and Lucanians, and taken many Townes, but in comparison of Curius his Glory the Efteem of these things were not so high. Among the rest who had Rewards behis Giory the Liteum of their Courage, he gave to Sev. Cornelins Merenda a Crown of Gold out flowed on them for their Courage, he gave to Sev. Cornelins Merenda a Crown of Gold out of the spoiles, because by his help chiefly a Certain Town of the Samnites was taken. While the Romans thus enjoy'd the comfort of their Victories, the Enemy was in a far different pollure. They had been long weary of Pyrrbus his Domination, but now after this unhappy fight, their mindes were fo filled with fear and Indignation that they could take

The King having been a long time averse from the Roman Warre, now utterly despairing of the Conquelt, thought of nothing more then how to get fafely and honourably out of traly, But keeping his Counsell to himlesse, he encouraged his Affociates, Thur they should not be cast down by one unluckly Overthrow, that they had not received so much less by the last fight, as by the former they had caused to the Romans, who notwithstanding could not be personated to Peace apon equal Conditions; That now they Bould imitate the Reman Constancy, and reservo themfelves for better forene, and all would yet go well; That there is yet frength sufficient left, whereby to maintain a long Warre; That in Greece he had many Potent Friends, from whom he might certainly expell succour. Neither were these things incredible, For he had already, especially Justinzs 17. 2. by Prolomy (who was then King of Macedon) been manifelly affifted; he being then in great Estimation both among Greeks and Barbarians, being much honour'd by the Etolians (then Diory), spud a most powerful Nation) as also by the Macedonians and the Kings of Illyrium, having obliged V.Liua. fome by Courtefies, others by Fear. Yet all his boalting was more with intent, to retain his Confederates (now ready to revolt) in Fidelity, till the seas were open for his Returne, then to continue the Warre in Italy, or that he put any Trust in Forreign Aid. Sending nevertheless his Embassadours to the Kings of Asa and Macedonia, of some he craved moneys, of Juli nut 3.3. others Men, of Antigonus (who was then King of Macedon) he craved both. With thefe hopes keeping his affociates firme to him (having in the mean time underhand provided all things for his Departure) his Embassadours now returned from Antigonus. Assembling therefore his own and the Italian Princes, he read unto them not those Letters which now he received, but others which came before from Antigons, promiting plentifull Affiltance fud-strangenat. denly to be sent; By this Craft having deluded both his own Associates, as also the Romans 6.6. who garrison'd neer him, the night following without any hindrance he hoysed saile, and made the Ceraunian Mountaines a Promoneory of Epirns. But that he might feem not difhonourably to have relinquished the war, and ingenerate a beliefe of his Return after he had accomplished the Design he was call'd aside for , he left behind him Milo to defend the Castle of Tarentus, and that he might not onely by hope of Reward, but by fear of the like Punishment, continue faithfull, he gave him a feat whose cover mas made of Nicias his skin, whom he had put to death for his Treason against him. Leaving therefore with him a garrison of fouldiers, with the Rest (to wit eight thousand foot, and sive hundred horse) he returned Platarch into his Kingdom, having been fix yeares ablent. At Rame not knowing but that Pyrhus Pyrhoc. 57. would renew the warre, they did at their Assembly choose May wrins Confull again, because he onely having had good fuccess against the King; was thought like to carry on the warre with greatest Authority, and best fortune, of the Patricians Ser. Cornelius Merenda was chosen, being promoted by his late purchased honour, and the Commendation of his Countreymen, under whose command he was last year; These being made Consul, sconverted the heat of the warre against the Lucanians, Samnites and Brutians, who defending themselves rather by the Difficulty of Places then by Armes, gave no occasion of any Memorable action like the former. Neither was Carins his Glory hereby diminished; every one still judging, that that Valiant K. Pyrrbus fled not so much for the overthrow sultain'd, as searing such a Captain as Vaniant N. 1 / From the Carins now again coming forth against him. To him therefore was attributed the Glory of Livie. having chased Pyrrhus out of Italy, and finishing the Warre. In that year which followed Epit. 14: Carins his Third Consulfhip, there came Embassadours from the Alexandrine Kings with Europius, b.z. gifts to Rome, and in the Confulthip of C. Dorso and C. Claudius Canina, Ptolomens Philadelphus hearing of Pyrrhus his flight, fent to congratulate with the Romans, and to defire to be Esteemed their Friend and Associate. But appealing the gods by Sacrifices and Ceremonies, they turned the punishment on the head of the delinquent, and buryed her alive at the Colline Gate. Velleius 1, 14 Plin. 3.5 which the Greeks call Posidonia; this City the Lucanians had taken from the Sybarites, and from 51r4b.b.2 them it lately came under the jurisdiction of the Romans. The memory of the year following is more notable, as putting an end not only to the war of the Sampites and others, but of the Tarentines also. L. Papirius Curfor, and Sp. Carvilius the second time Confuls, having Lucania, Samnium, with the Brutians and Tarentines for their Provinces, did by their wisdom 481 and worthy deeds fulfil the expectation of all men, for indeed this pair of Confuls was on purpole chosen in hope of finishing the War this year. The Samnites being conquer'd by Carvi-Livie,24.9 hus the seventy first year after the war first began, did now with greater faithfulness receive the Zonaris Livie 31 31 conditions of Peace imposed on them. Lu. Papirius with great flaughter having overcome the Brutians and Lucanians, compelled them to fue for peace. But (as it happens in one main war against many neighbouring People, the confines of whose Territories were interchangeably mixcd) Papirius had to do also with the Samnites, Carvilius with the Brutians and Lucanians, and both of them with the Tarentines. Neither were the forces only of the Tarentines routed and put to flight, but their City also recover'd into obedience. Which business ought to be the more punctually related, because, besides the Victory of a most famous City, it comprehendeth Liv.Epit. the death of Pyrrhas, the subtilty of the Carthaginians, and the first beginning of emulation between them and the Romans.

> ched by reason of his success in Macedonia, did strengthen the minds of the Italians against their present losses. For being a man of a fierce stirring spirit, not able long to rest, he had made war upon Antigonus, because he sent him no affistance into Italy, and overcoming him in a fet battel, had almost driven him out of his Kingdom. Whence the Romans were in perpetual fear least he should return into Italy with a more numerous Army, and renew the war more heavily then before. But his unexpected death did suddenly cut off both his hopes and fears of all men. For being infatiably defirous of encreasing his power, under pretence of refetling Cleamens in his Kingdom of Sparta (being then at odds with Arens) he entred Peloponnelus with a purpole to keep it in his own hands; and though he did in vain affault their City, yet he afflicted the Lacedemonians with great calamities: In Argos, in the mean time, there being two Factions. Ariftippus the head of the one called in Antigonus, Ariftias Patron of the other invited Pyrrhus to his relief and for the pulling down his adversary. For Antigonus was also come into Peloponnesus to affist the Lacedemonians against the common enemy. In the same night at divers Ports were both the Kings forces admitted into the City by the Argives. Pyrhus understanding his men were hard put to it, entred the City himself, and beholding a Brais Statue of a Wolf and a Bull as fighting, was prefently possessed with an opinion of his approaching death. For he was informed by an antient Oracle, That that place would prove fatal to him where he should see a Wolf and a Bull fighting; he was therefore resolved to draw back his forces and retreat out of the City. But the Elephants and fouldiers coming in to his fuccour, meeting Helenus the fon of Pyrrhus, quite stopped up the passage, so that some ftriving to go out, fome to come in, the enemy likewise fore preffing upon those who gave back, the Argives, Macedonians, Epirots and Lacedamonians who came along with Arens, some Elephants also, all crouding and being crouded one by another in narrow streets, caused great sear and tumult amongst them.

Pyrrhus, when two years fince he failed from Italy, left a Garrison in the Castle of Taren-

Strabe enemy (giving advice, crying out with his voice and lifting up his hand) was by a certain young man of Arges lightly wounded with a spear. This young man's mother a poor old woman (fitting among others upon the house top to behold the fight) when the faw Pyrrhus in fury and violence letting upon him who wounded him, being aftonished at her son's danger, sudden-Ovid in Ibim. ly fnatched up a Tile, and with both her hands flung it down on the Kings head. So miferable and void of honour was Pyrrhay his death, then whom that Age brought not forth any man Valefium more worthy, either for Courage of Mind, Soundness in Counsel or Skil in Marshal affairs, Fustin.25.5 besides many other endowments both of Soul and Body. But by his Ambition he destroy'd the Iuftin,25.4 fruit of all his Labours, and defaced the Ornaments of his Virtue; he would have been much more happy if contented with his own fortune; and certainly the most potent Prince living had he used as much Wildom and Circumspection in keeping what he got, as did Valour and Industry

> This news, being brought into Italy, diddiversly, according to their several Affections, cause joy in some Cities, and forrow in others. Other People who were at their own disposal, bought their Peace of the Romans upon what termes they could; But the Garrison of the Epirots, and Milo governour of the Caltle restrained the Tarentines from using their Liberty. Between whom, by degrees from lighter injurys and Reproaches, at length brake out open Enmity; fo that the Tarentines being on each hand preffed with great Difficulties, having the Romans their Enemies without the walls, and the Epirots within, fent Embassadours to crave fuecour from Carthage. The Carthaginians, who possessed great part of Sicily and wished the Coaft-Towns of Isaly rather in their own hands then the Romans, readily came with a mighty Navy, pretending only to cast out Milo, but resolving, if they gained Tarentus, to Livie Epitomi maintain it against the Romans. When therefore L. Papirius the Consul was also come, Tares-14 the Carthaginians besseging the same Casses by sea. The Romans, in this state of affaires, being no leffe folicitous lest the Carthaginians should take the Castle then that themselves should loofe it, fubtilly attempting all means of victory., treated with Milo by Convenient Messegers, That if by his means they obtained Tarentus, they would suffer himself, with all his Men, lafely Frontinas to depart with bag and baggage. Milo, sending nothing at present more convenient for him, deals with the Tarentines . That joyning Counsels together they might deliberate on their Common Safety: and at length perswades them, To send himself Embassadour to Papirius, diligently to conclude on Articles for all their Benefits. As they had willingly hereunto affented out of wearinesseof Cares and dangers: Milo accordingly, being gone to the Consul, with whom he had fecretly contrived his Deligne, brings back prety faire conditions, and a most certain hope of making an agreement not to be repented of. The Credulous Tarentines hereupon with much fecurity and confidence lay afide all care and Circumspection, giving Mile opportunity of delivering not only the Caffle, but also the Citie it selfeup to the Romans. The Carthaginians no whit contented with this Event, neverthelesse pretending, Themselves friends to the Ro- Zonsta mans, and that the only cause of their coming was to Expel Milo, hoised fails and returned. Oresine 4 3 Some Authors affirm that the Romans forwarded the Carthaginians, That if they intermedled Livie Epicon in the Tarentine affairs, they would make a breach of the League, and that they not only flighted this admonition, but fent Auxiliaries to stand in Battel against them; upon which account chiefly the War brake forth between the Romans and Carthaginians in Sicily; though the Carthaginians, willing to cover their fault by Perjury, took Oath, That they did nothing With evil Goteficidat. or deceitful intent. As I will not deny but that some such passage might happen between the Vicionalia Generals, or that the people commonly discourse so, while the Romans brooked not the others Paulus discourse for their design. So I think there after Historical. prefence, and the Carthaginian endeavoured to keep close their design; so I think there after hips and the Carthaginian endeavoured to keep close their design; so I think there after hips and the Carthaginian endeavoured to keep close their design; so I think there after hips a control of the control of t wards arose more probable causes of that War, in that it brake not out on the sudden. Fabius Gurges, mora and the others who were fent to Alexandria, relate in Senate the Refult of their Embaffage, Iuft. 18. 2 That they were received and Entertained with all kind of Hospitality and Benevolence, that great and Magnificent gifts were fent to them at their first arrival, but much greater at their degrant are, that they thought it to become the Roman dignity and abstinence, mudifity to refuse the first, that the other, which were by all means to be received, they had, before they did any other bu-Valer. Q. Fabius, who was prime man in the Embassy, was, I believe, in this consideration also preserred before so many Egregious men, and chosen Prince of the Senate by M. Curius and L. Papirius the Cen-Frontinus de fors, being now, by reason of the Nobility of his Family, his Fathers Merits, two Consulships, Aquaductibus and as many Triumphs, Inferior to none in Honour. He was a man indeed of high deferts, as for the greatnels of his Exploits, fo for his many Illustrious examples in other Virtues; as we shall by the by manifest, by relating some of his Actions and Sayings; For I count it not unworthy or unbefeeming the Office of an Historian, to recount thole things whereby those who are hereafter to undertake the management of publick affairs may be no leffe instructed to the attaining Felicity by Virtue, then by Military counsels and performances. In the Sabine War (when there was Strabo b. 9 fuch plenty of spoils that Fabius the writer of the History, thinketh the Romans then to have had the first taste of Riches) Curius, claiming nothing of so rich a victory, but the conscience and fame of it, continued in his former poverty and hardinesse of life.

H E most potent enemy of Rome being now after many battels vanquished, and peace fetled throughout all Italy, The Senators entred into Consultation how to make a good use of their Victories. They concluded to fine all Nations who had born Arms against them; the loss of part of their Territories, taking a more severe revenge of the Tarentines. by how much the more wantonly and intemperately they had offended they were therefore commanded to refign up all their Arms and Ships, their Walls were demolished, a Tribute imposed upon the City, and nothing granted them but Peace and Liberty. There was now nothing of an old score more to be intended, then to punish the Treachery of that Legion, which circumventing the Rhegians by craft, had now for ten years possessed their City. They foreseeing that the Roman affairs proceeding so prosperously, their wickedness would not paffe unrevenged, had very diligently taken care for whatfoever belonged to ftrengthening the City, and provided all things for their own defence, being very conscious that what is obtained by cunning and violence, cannot but by the fame arts be maintained. Befides their own innate Fierceness, they much confided in the friendship of the Mamertines, and were puffed up with their fuccess against the Carthaginians and Pyrrhus, whereby they had sufficiently made experiment of the strength of their City, and the courage of their own minds, having quickly repulfed the enemies from the fiege. They fored therefore to fuch an height of Rebellion, that daring to take Croton, which was by some betrayed to them, they slew the Roman Garrison and demolished the City. Wherefore L. Genucius the Conful, who was that year Colleague with C. Quir Elius, had commission to execute vengeance upon them, and the Rebels being confined within the Walls, the City was befieged. But while they strongly relisted with their own and the Mamertine forces, the Confui having fultained some incommodities, and become in want of necessary provisions, was affished with Corn and men by Hiero, who was at that time Prince of Syracuse. For he, being offended with the Mamertines, did likewise hate their affociates of Rhegium; he was likwise moved by the encrease of the Roman power, to preoblige them to suture benefits, as occasion should serve.

The Citie being at length forced to yield, the Mamertines were by the Conful difmiff'd upon certaine Covenants, the Runaways and thieves, 'many whereof had fled thither as to a fanctua-

Herein was shewed a notable Example of publick severity, for the Senate decreed, first, They should all be secured in prison, and afterward, be led to Execu. Val Max. 2.7 tion: And when M. But left by lo severe an act they might contract an odium, and the forrow of the vulgar people be aggravated if such a multitude should at one time be put to death, they did every day execute fifty, first scourging, then beheading them. Moreover it was ordered that neither their Bodies should be buried, nor any Mourning made for their Death. Decim Jubellins (who had lived unto that day, after the Freeting Brat. The thing being unufual in that Climat, and by ma- Dil 3.17 ny look'd upon as a Prodigie, perplexed mens minds with wonderful terror, their fear being not long after much encreased, when 2. Ogulnius Gallus and C. Fabius Pittor being Consuls, many strange unheard of fights were seen, and many more reported. At Rome the Temple of Salus with part of the walls was smitten with thunder and lightning; three Wolves before day brought Orofius 4.4. a carkals half eaten into the City, and being themselves seared by the noise of men, lest it in the market-place torn into pieces limb from limb.

At Fo mis the walls were faid to be often struck and cast down with thunderbolts; and news was brought that in the Calenian fields, the earth opened, and fire fuddenly brake out, which flaming for three whole daies together, burnt five acres of ground to afhes, infomuch that not only all the fruits on that place were blafted, but even the Trees died at the very Roots. These things caused more seare then misery at Rome; No great matter ensued, but that a War was Emposius b. 2 made against the Picentians, which being the next yeare finished, added likewise that province to the Roman Jurisdictions. Now in the Citie began the Coining filver, (their wealth being Livie Epit, 15 encreased by their victories) whereas before Brasse only was used in all Exchanges; but then Zonaras pennies and half penaies were made of filver, which went for ten, and five pounds of braffe; there were likewife leffer pieces which being effeemed at two pound and an halfe of braffe, were Plin. 33.3 from their value called , Seftercies. It was called , Moneta , because it was coined in the Temple of Juno, to whom that Name was given, by reason she did Movere, that is, admonish the Romans when in the War of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines they Consulted about their wants That money would not be wanting to those, who observed Justice and prosecuted Wars. The Confulls C. Gallus and C. Fabius went forth to apprehend Lollins the Samnite, who having been Hostage at Rome had privily escaped, and now possessing a certain Castle, committed Plunder and Pillage round about, ftirring up the minds of his Countrymen to Rebellion, when they were scarce well composed by the last peace.

But he with the forces he had gather'd (being for the most part unarmed) could not long refift: The greatest difficulty and danger was in the Province of the Carcines (a part of Samui. Some of the Garrison upon condition of Pardon, let the Romans into the walls in a bright Moon-shiny night, and the Townsinen mustring themselves together upon the tumult; when they first began to fight a great drift of snow fell and took away their fight: This accident was a great help to the Carcines against the Romans, who were ignorant of the Passages, in so much that they were in very great danger, and now ready to give back and retreat (which in the dark could not have been done without much lofs) when on a fudden the fnow ceased and the Moon shone out again, and then being freed from blind fear, they did by their courage make way to

About these times was a Colony planted at Ariminum in the Picene grounds, which belonged to the Senones of Gallia, and another at Maleventum in Samnium, but changing the Name, which seemed Ominous, they called it Beneventum. The Sabines who were many years agoe admitted into the City, had now the liberty of Votes granted them. Clandius had also business in Umbria, where he took Camarinum and fold the inhabitants for flaves. But because the war seemed not very honestly to be managed by the General, the Romans preferring Justice before their own profit, decreed That the Camertes should be fought out and redeemed, that they should be received into the City, have a place of habitation allotted to them in the Aventine Mount, and their ground restored to

Greater was the joy for the Picentine Victory, which was thought worthy to be Coined in Pigbius in an. their new Pieces of filver, that it might the more publickly be known, and the Memory thereof transmitted to Posterity. 2. The Illyrians and Macedonians are adjacent to them, so that against strong and Coveteous neighbours they had much adoe to preferve their own liberty. The meffage was wonderful welcome and with much Humanity received by the Romans, not fo much for the wealth of the Citie Livie Epicom. Which was but small, as for Future hopes in that they thought a way laid open and occasion given them of greater delignes hereafter. Infomuch that very severe punishment was inflicted on certain noble young men who upon a quarrel arifing had ftrucken the Embassadours. 2. Fabius was not protected either by the Dignity of his office, for he was then Adile or the greatnesse of his Extraction, but was delivered up to the Apollonians for his offence. Cn. Apronius who was likewife Adile, was given up for the same crime, the Senate decreed, they should by

Heralds be delivered up into the hands of the Embassadours that a Quastour Bould eac along with them to Brundusium lest their friends and Kindred Bould rescue them by the way. This was a great testimonie as of their publick faith, fo of their wisdome; For having a desire to draw forreign Nations into their friendship by the Reputation of their Justice, it much concerned them most precisly to punish the injuries done to those who first came to enter into their society. Neither would any thing have proved more destructive to their designs then that the Appollonians should would any thing nave proved increase their act, and others of their example. And hence forung that cu-have repented themselves of their act, and others of their example. And hence forung that cufrom . which was constantly in after times observed, That they who had strucken the Embaf gatis, fadours of a free Citie should be delivered up to it. But the Appollonians, when they were brought Zonaras into their Citie, wifely confidering they should gaine more by Clemency and humanity then Revenge, sent them safe home again. This year each Consul triumphed twice : D. Junius the fifth of the Calends of October, Numerius Fabius the third of Nones of the same Month over the Sarsinates, a people of Umbria. Againe they tryumphed over the Sallentines and Messagians who had affilted the Salientines . Fabius on the Calends of February , Junius on the Nones. And this was the Conclusion of all their Italian Wars; For what was acted in Volsmia next year,

Quintus Fabius Gurges the third time Conful, L. Mamilius Vitulus being his Colleague, was not so much a war against a just enemy, as vengeance inflicted upon slaves in behalf of their affociates. The Volinians, the richest people of all Etruria, did implore the Romans assistance against Florus 1,21. those who were formerly their servants. For by very ill and foolish advice (whether it were that thereby they thought to increase their strength so much broken in the late wars, or that themselves tumbling in delights were loath to trouble themselves with the labour of Arms) they made their fervants free of the City, and committed the Militia into their hands. Af- Johannes Anterward they began to be chosen Senators, and to bear Offices of State. In short time oppress tiochenus. fing the old Citizens, and usurping the whole power of the Commonwealth to themselves, they apud Vales did most insolently exercise their Liberty against their Masters who gave it them. It was now grown common to Ravish Virgins and honest Matrons by force, to heap Contumelies and Indignities upon Parents and Husbands, crying for justice according to Law; and all things were confusedly hurried according to the pleasure of the vilest most petulant Knaves. And that we may not pass over in silence a rare Precedent, to what iffue the beastly impudence of slavish minds will proceed to when it bath gotten power, they made a Law , That the Libertines might Vel. Max. 9.1.2 have licence of Copulation with the wives and daughters of their Patrons, and that the Maiden-ext. bead of a Virgin designed in marriage to a true Freeman, should first be prostituted to one of their Order. Wherefore the old Vollinians being neither able any longer to endure these miseries, Zonaras nor by their own power to repulle and avoid them, fecretly confulting together, refolved to fend Anti-de virts Embassadors to Rome. They having by private solicitations prevailed that the Senate would Illust c. 26 meet in some private house (for they saw unavoidable ruine over their heads if the business was known) they did by a very forrowful discourse make them acquainted with their sad condition. wherewith the Fathers being moved to compassion, promised them assistance for the recovery of their loft Rights.

But these things which were thought to be agitated in secret, were by a Samnite discovered to the parties complained of; For he, a gueft to the master of the house where the Senate met, being then fick, was by forgetfulneffe left in a place where he overheard all their discourse and betrayed it. Therefore the Embassadours, after their Return from Rome, were called into question, and the whole businesse being found out, were with other prime Men of the Citie Iulius obsequens cruelly put to death. The Romans, now having a juster cause of War, sent 2. Fabins the de Prosigii. Conful with an Army against them, whom, daring to encounter him in open field he put to c.27. flight, and slew a very great Number in the Pursuit: The Rest who betooke themselves into their place of defence, he refolved with counterworkes to beliege. But they making strong Refiftance, The Conful (as there were frequent Pickerings and light skirmifhes)unwarily venturing too far in the fight, received a wound whereof he dyed, which the belieged understanding, made a Sally with the greatest strength they could, hoping if they suddenly assaulted the enemy now in trouble for the loss of the Conful, to force them to break up the fiege. But the event of the battel was contrary, for being roughly received by the Romans, they were beaten in again with loffe.

In this fight I suppose Decises Mus to have had the Command; for he might happily have been Fabins his Lieutenant, and after his death be chief in managing the War till a successfor was fent. And hence I conjecture it comes to passe that some negligent Historians have ascribed Author viru to Decias Mas both the beginning and finishing of this War. Cn. Cornelins L, F. Cn. N. illoft. c.36 Blasso and C. Marcins were created Censors that year, and this last having before born the same Capitolina Office, was from this his Magistracy called Conformus. Afterward feeing (many placing their habitation near them for Traffick fake) they began to look like a City, and that the Africans were willing to entertain among them men forich and very gentle and quier, they hearkned to the counsel fent from Utica (which was also a Colonie of the Tyrians) which advised them, After their example to build a City. So it was agreed, That the Africans should afford them ground, and that the Phanicians in recompense thereof should pay a vearly Tribute.

The work being finished, Dido gave it a name in her own Language, Carthadas; the Greeks called it Carchedo, and the Romans by an error in Pronunciation, Carthago. This: City having Loving Neighbours, an Industrious people, and what was above all, a Wife Queen, did in a short time wonderfully increase. These things seeme to have been acted some seventy years before the foundation of Rome; for about fo ancient a Circumstance Authors do not very well agree. But as Elifa her life was notable for variety of Chances, so was her death very remarkable. Parbas a Petit King of some African Province, sought to marry her, threatning upon refusal to raile war against her. But as the was averse from marriage by reason of her singular Chashity and love of her former husband, so she very well understood that in these tender beginnings of affairs, a war would prove fatal and destructive; therefore taking time to deliberate, as if the had at length overcome her own Refolution, and were inclined to marry the African, caused, a Pile of wood to be crefted before her intended marriage, whereon to facrifice to the Infernal gods in behalf of her husband Sichaus; And after many Sacrifices offer'd, the did at length afcend the Pile, and killed her felf with a fword the brought with her; her love to her Husband and Subiects exceeding the care of her own health. The Carthaginians returned her what honour they siting traite could, and while the Commonwealth flourished, worshipped her as a Goddess, raising a 4.3 Temple in the place where the lived, calling her Dido, which in their language fignifieth a Virago, Servius Ful-

When after her death no man was thought worthy to fucceed her in the Kingdom, the Citie denfis in Virg. began to be governed by the Mixed Power of Nobles and Commons. The Name of Kings still remained, but they were like the Lacedamonian Kings; but that the honour was not to any Ariflot, Polit, Certaine families annexed, but conferred on any Prime Man who exceeded others in Virtue 2.11 and Riches. These had the management of Wars abroad (wherefore the Romans called them Pretours and Dictatours, comparing their power with the usuage of their own Commonwealth) at home they were Princes of all publick Confultations, with their advice the affaires of the Avillation Citie were ordered: Things of heigher concernement were referred to the people, their fentence decided all controversie between the Kings and Senatours: They also had authority to alter the Laws made by the Kings and Councel, if they feemed contrary to the good of the Publick which any man had Liberty to question. Which too great power of the Commons, being augmented to Polyb. 5. 49 an intolerable height, by flattering Parasites and Orators, did in after time infinitely wrong Livie, 30.6 and obstruct the Carthaginian affaires: Moreover in the Senate there were thirty of the more Cornelius Ne-Antient appointed as a supreme Councel, and these had greatest authority with all Men. There Pa was like wife a Superinfpectour of Manners, invested with the same power as the Roman Censors. Amilicar c.3 to maintain publick Decency and Discipline. In processe of time, after many victories, their greatnesse being encreased, they chose a greater Number of Commanders for the War. But when the Centamviri or hundred men behaved themselves with much בונבי insolence, Hanniball by a Law reduced them into Order, it being decreed, That the Judger Livie 33 22 fould Tearly be chosen, and that no man should continue in office two yeares together. Their gods and holy Rites they brought most from Types; some they did afterwards add. 7 mso they Virgilb. 1 chiefly adored; and Ecologius not a little, in whose honour they crected a Magnificent 5 rabb. 17 Temple in the Citie; Apollo's house was likewise very rich, covered with plate of Gold, wherein Appien Panicis was a famous statue which after the Ruine of Carthage was carried to Rome and placed in the great Fluinioc, I Shew-place called Circus Maximus. But to Hercules at Tyrus they every year fent a ship, with Polyb, least, great care well trimmed, with the Tithes of their yearly fruits, and spoiles gotten in War. Having reigned therefore four and fifty years, in such a time when two most potent Cities on each hand did with most sharp contentions, fight for the dominion of the world, troubled with no War abroad (unleffe in his first year) nor affaulted by any Treason at home, he died being above ninty years old, his ferses being at that age entire and his body found as a certain argument of his Temperance, being not only beloved by his own people, but had in great Estimation both with the Romans and Grecians; when he would often have divefted himfelf of the Principality, the Citizenes did openly prohibite him; And his fon Gelon, who, at above fifty years of age, died before him, did all his life time, even to the last, with constant faith and obedience honour him, thewing a rare example of Moderation, in that he chose rather for ever to want a Kingdom then lose his Father. This Hieron was by his Father Hierocles (who derived his Pedigree from Gelon an antient Tyrant of Sicily) exposed to the mercy of the world; for as much as he being a Noble man was shamed to bring up a child which he had begotten on a servant. But being destitute of all human succour, the Bees for many days fed him, puting honey into his mouth as he lay upon the ground. Hierocles being much affected with this Prodigie, and the answers of the Southsayers, who affirmed, That hereby Kingly power was pre-fignified took home the Infant, acknowledged it for his own, and in hopes of his future great- foanner Sarifneffe took diligent care for his Education. As he was learning his book among his equals, 'tis burienfiede mir reported, that a Wolf fuddenly appearing in the midft of the boyes took his book out of his Eb Curialium. hand. When he first entred into the Wars, 'tis said, An Eagle pitch'd upon his shield, and an sustaint Owle upon his speare; which was thought a signe of wisdom and strength; and by reason of the Kingly bird, of highest honour and dignity. But he himself shortly gave more certaine evidence being of exceeding comelinesse and strength of body, but much more illustrious and beloved for his wit. arose between the army and Citie of Syracuse, Artemidorus and Hiero were, in the Camp neer Polyb.s.8 Mergana, by fuffrage of the fouldiers chosen Commanders. By the advice of Hiero, and the help of his friends, some souldiers being privily sent into the Citie reduced it into their Power: where Hiero shewed himself a gallant Man, and fit for the government of any Realme whatfoever : For, of the feveral factions which were therein, he neither flew nor banished any one Man, but by his clemencie, Moderation and upright Counsel so compounded their differenes, Julinus 23.4. that he was chosen Pretor of Syracuse with the good will and affection even of those against Polybius whom he came, as much as of those men who invited him thither. He with his whole heart as fincerely tendring the publick good as his own (having observed an ill Custome of a long flanding in Sicily, That the General could no fooner lead his forces out of the City but there was either some sedition raised in the Army, or some innovation made at home) began to confult with himself. In whose hands to entrust the City when he should be forced to go out to War. He married therefore the daughter of Leptis, who was very popular, of great authority among the Citizens, of eminent honesty and faithful to his trust.

Having thus provided for Domestick affairs, he devised a remedy (very necessary indeed but not altogether praise-worthy) against the infolency of the mercenary souldiers : For drawing out his army against the Mamertines when they met him near Centuripa, he order'd his battel near the River of the Cyamofians with such art, that he left a good distance between the Citizens and the Mercenaries, then commanding the Mercenaries to begin the fight, as if he and the City forces would on some other side Charge the enemy while they were already busied. The Mercenaries by this means being furrounded by the greater number of Mamertines, were flain; himself (having thus employed the enemy) marched fair and softly with his other forces to Sy-

Having in this manner purged the Army of those who were ill disposed and enclined to sedition, he diligently Traineth his City forces, hireth new Auxiliaries, and now having the goodwill of all (the most insolent being removed and the rest not daring to murmure) he order'd the Government according to his own pleasure. In the mean while, the Mamertines proud of their late victory and grown more fierce, rashly, and without fear invaded and spoiled the Syracufan Teritories. Hiero now confiding both in the City and Army, forthwith marcheth out Diadori Eclor. against them, and pitcheth his Camp near the enemies City, almost empty by reason of having b.22 fent out every way fo many Troops. The Mamertines understanding the danger, suddenly return home to the relief of their City, with all their forces joyned. Hiero removing his Camp out of the Mamertine Fields, taketh the City of Mila, and in it fifteen hundred fouldiers; thence gaining by the way some Castles, he marcheth to Amsselum (which is seated in the midst between Agyrium and Conturina) which (though it were well fenced, and protected by a strong Garrison) he forced and demolished, the souldiers he received into pay, and caused to sight under him : the grounds he divided between the Centuripines and Agyrines. Being animated with this success, he again invaded the Mamertine Teritories, taketh Aleftim upon composition; but the Abacenines and Tyndarites voluntary furrender themselves to him. Hereby were the Cities on each hand next to Messana on both the coasts subject to Hiero, (for the Tindaritans inhabit toward the Etrurian Sea, the Tauromenians, who were at this time in friendship with the Syracufans, toward the Sicilian Sea.) The Mamertines therefore being streightned, fend out their forces under the conduct of Cio their Pretor to oppose the enemy, who now was lodged near the River Longanus in the Mylean fields. The battel being begun, and the fight along time doubtful, Hiero fuddenly fending in fresh Troops upon the Flank of the Mamertines, made Polis, 1.9 the Victory his own. For before the fight Hiero had placed together two hundred Messanian Disdorus Exuls, valiant men, who hated the Mamertines, with four hundred choice men of his own Army, commanding them, To go about the hill Thorax, and by a sudden incursion to fall upon the enemy on the other side, which they floutly performing were the cause why the whole Mamertine Army fell by the fword.

Cio, seeing all lost, and desiring nothing more then to dye, was taken prisoner, fore wounded, and conveyed into the Syracusan campe, finding the Prediction of the Entrailes and Southsayers true in another sense then he expected. For before the Battel the Prophets looking into the Intestines of the facrifice promised, He should lie in the Enemies Camp that night: Which he esteeming an argument of victory too late found himself deluded by another that his fon rode upon in the Field, conjecturing thereby his death, he refolutely pulling the cloaths and plaisters off his wounds made way to his own death. The Mamertines, understand. ing their overthrow grew full of despair , and were now ready to present their humble supplication to the Conquerours, when an unexpected accident prevented them. It happened that at the same time Hannibal; the Carthaginian Pretor, was in the Liparaan Islands, which are adjacent to Sieily. He having intelligence of Hiero's Victory, fearing left (the Mamertines being utterly vanquished) the Syracusan power would grow too great for the Carthaginians came fuddenly over under pretence of congratulating with Hiero for his Victory; and hindering him from directly marching to Melfana, did himfelf make first enterance, and when the Mamertines were now ready to yield, did not only possesse them with hopes of retaining their liberty. but less astrong Garrison of his own fouldiers amongst them. Hiero understanding himself by this craft deluded, & being not sufficiently prepared for a siege, made now more difficult returned to Syracufe, where being received by all with very great joy, he was by an universal acclamation faluted King, which Title he afterward retained with the confent both of the Citizens and others of the Island without. When Hiero was retreated, the Mamertines having a little space of resuming confidence, began to deliberate upon their present condition, but were divided into two Factions; some thought it not to be disouted, 'But that they, should commit themselves to the protection of the Carthaginians, which as for many other reasons it was convenient, so having admitted their Gar-'rison, 'twas little lesse then necessary. On the other side 'twas said, 'The Carthaginians were no leffe enemies to the Mamertines then Hiero, that without doubt their purpose of de-Polybins 'fending of the City was not out of good will, but defire of Dominion; That of a long time they had aspired to the Empire of Sicily, neither were cast down from their bold hopes by losse of Armies and Navies, no not by wars in Africa, and fear of their own state at home; That therefore without exception they must prove Vassals if they commit themselves to those who have so strong a Navy, and possesse greatest part of Sicily it self. That 'tis therefore no way 'expedient to defire aid from the Carthaginians, a covetous, unfaithful people, who will lay heavier burdens upon them then they could fear from the Syraculans. If the Punick Garrison came only with intent to preferve the City from Hiero, they may now upon fair terms be difmiffed having done the work : But if they have some other Glandestine design, it behooveth them with the greater care to prevent the danger of their deceitful friendihip. That they should rather implore affiftance from the Romans, as a people invincible, of unquestionable faith and fincerity, who will have neither occasion nor opportunity of keeping Mellona under their ju-risation, as having not a foot of ground in Sicily, nor any use of sea affairs, and consequently taking no care therein. That they would be abundantly content to keep Italy Coure from Hiero and the Carthaginians, having made Meffana strong as an obstacle to their further proceedings. That therefore they should continue to rely upon the Roman faith rather then any other Nation: that indeed they could neither with honefty or any convenience change their former counsels, having already sent Embassadors and obtained hope of succour and relief. For the Mamertines before their last battel with Hiero, beginning then to distrust in their own strength Zonaras. had craved affiftance of the Romans as their Kinsmen. And the people being perswaded by the Consuls who were desirous of employment in the Wars, had decreed that aid should be sent to them : but the Senate out of shame to be counted authors of the business, did deferit, For they who had lately so severely punished their own Legion for the wicked surprize of Rhegium, if they should now assist the Mamertines, who had by the like treachery obtained the mastery of Messana, they saw they should clearly loofe the reputation of their Justice and Fidelity, which by their former act they had acquired. But now having heard of the Mamertines overthrow and not doubting but if they were for faken by the Romans, they would apply themselves to the Carthaginians, with one confent they ordained to fend them relief. For in the Senate many had before inclined to this opinion, as forefeeing that otherwile Meffane quickly, and not long after all Sicily would come under the Carthaginian power, which if it were once come to paffe, they should be forced to fight with the Carthaginians for their own possessions in Italy. For this danger would prove unavoidable, as well by reason of the infatiable desire of Rule in those who are potent, as by the convenient scituation of the places. For Italy, proceeding in a long tract between the two feas from the Ligurians and Venetians, to the Brutians, is there divided from Sicily by a very narrow Channel. For there is no doubt made but that these Regions in old times were a continent, afterward divided by the fea; whether the grounds being low were easily overflown, or whether some earthquake or strength of the Tides cut off the Coffidorus Va- Ishmos. From hence many think that Town to be called Rhogium, because things which are broken, are by fome such word nominated in the Greek Tongue. 'Tis therefore very credible that the first inhabitants of Sicily came out of Italy, as may be conjectured by the very name. For the Opici are faid to have built a Citie on the adverse shore over against Italy, which because it was scituate in a Creek of the sea bearing the figure of a Sythe, they called it, I beleeve, Sicilia, which the Grecians afterward coming, called Zancle, both those words in the several Languages fignifying a Sythe. From thence, as often it happens, the name was derived to the whole Island . Which was by many called both Zancie and Sicilia.

This Island far excelleth all others in the Mediterranean Sea, both in extent of ground, and fruitfulnesse of Soile, yeelding abundance of Oyl and Wine and Corn of the best; adorned with many, and those very great Cities, even to wonder; and if you consider the Commodity of Diodori Eclog. the Havens, and seituation of the whole Island, there is scarce to be found in the world a place more fit for the chiefe feat of an Empire: For, being near adjacent to Italy, on the contrary part it looketh toward Africa, on another fide lyeth Sardinia, and on east it hath Peloponnefus devided from Gracia by the Ionian sea: On every hand the voyage is short, and the passage and devided from organization of the same alledged, yet the only cause of the War between the Carthaginians and Romans, was, with L. Ampeliac out doubt, the great desire each of them had to be Masters of this Island. The Romans found fault, c.46 That the Carthaginians contrary to the league had affifted the Tarentines; the Carthaginians on the other fide charged them, for having entred into Confederacy with Hiero against them, But to so great a power were now both these Cities advanced, that it could not be avoided, but that at some time or other for some cause they must needs find occasion to fall out. For as Trees planted at no great distance, for a while do not much hinder one the other, but being grown to some biguesse bereave one the other of Juice and nourishment from the earth, and at ful growth enterwinding both root and branches mutually destroy one the other: So rising Empires cannot long be at Amitie and friendship, but, swallowing up what is interjacent between each others Donions, defire to try the superiority between themselves, neither being able to put a limit to their own ambition or to enlarge theis Territories without removing all Opponents.

To these causes may be added the great power the Comminalty had in each City, together with their earnest desire of undertaking the War. In Carthage the vulgar sort did much prevail, Aristo, Folis, and now in the encrease of their City, growing rich by many Commodities, were willing for 2.11 gains sake to have war upon war. The condition of the Roman people was not much different, Zonaras for having in the former wars sustained damage in their estates, they hoped by the riches of Si- Polyb.r.11 eily to recompence themselves, and therefore, according to that power they had lately extorted from the Senate, did approve and confirm their fentence who perswaded the war. Hereby Appins the Conful being commissioned (whereas otherwise the major part of the Senate had Livie Ep assented, overpowring the votes of those who stood to old Rules) without delay sendeth Clau-Zonara. dissa Tribune of fouldiers beforehand with some few thips, to observe as opportunity, and if any were offered, to waste over into Sicily. When he was come to Regism, not daring to Hazard Autide virie his ships because he saw the seas obstructed with a greater sect of Carthaginians, he entred 1114/6.27 into a Fishermans vessel and crossed over to Messana; there discoursing with the Mamertines as the prefent occasion required, being not able to overcome the contradiction of the Carthagias the personned without having gone his bashireste. But awhite after understanding there was a differnion at Messan, some pleasing against the Roman affistance, the greater part bearing ill will to the Carthaginian Garrison, he again crossed the sea, and among other things to the prefent purpole told them, His coming was only to fet the City at liberty, which when he had effected he would immediately return. The Carthaginians answer'd, The Romans need not trouble themselves for the liberty of a City which was under their jurisdiction, the Carthaginians had already out of their good will taken care that the Mamertines should not be compelled to be subject to the Syracusans: That therefore he might depart, or elfe give some other reason of his being at Messana. Claudisu denied, The City was free so long as a Forreign Garrison continued therein To this when no man returned any answer, the Carthaginians out of pride, the Mamertines for fear holding their peace, he cunningly and readily proceeded, "Tis plaine, faith he, by this your general silence, that the Carthaginians canse is unjust, and that the Mamerines are defroms of liberty, otherwise neither would the one forbeare to justifie their own Right, and the cshers, if they consensed with the Carthaginians, having no cause to diffemble, would freely and openly speak their minds. At this there arising a kind of a noise in the assembly , many praising his speech as true, and indeed agreeing with their inward thoughts; he (thinking he had, for the present, sufficiently moved the Mamertines and tryed the disposition of their minds) went back to Rhegium. And not long after, having made ready his ships, he attempted to passe over ; but being much inferiour to the Carthaginian Commanders ; both in number of veffels; and skill in fea affairs, and being beaten back by the violence of the Waves, in a fudden ftorme arifing, he returned to his port, having loft fome ships, and hardly saving the Rest. But being nothing terrified with this miladventure, he new trinoned histhips, resolving upon a better opportunity once more to make tryal of Fortune: When behold messengers came from Hanno (Governour of the Mamertine Garrison, and Guardian of the seas) bringing with them all the ships and men which the Carthaginians had taken in the sormer fray : Hanne's defign herein was to salt the blame of the breach of Covenants upon the Romans, he therefore alto complained. That they had by force attempted to fail in those fear which were in the possession of the Carthaginians; and furthermore-perfuaded them to have a great care of preferving peace

But hearing that Claudius would not admit of any conditions unleffe they would withdraw their forces out of Messana, and that again he endeavoured to cross the sea, he vaunted, That be would not suffer the Romans so much as to Wash their hands in that fea. Nevertheless he could not prevent Claudius, who observing the Nature of the sea, laid hold of an opportunity when the wind happily helped the Tide, and arrived in Sicily without opposition. There calling a Counsel of those Mamertines he found in the Haven, he perswaded them, To call Hanno to them, as if they had some business at present to consult with him about. For Hanno, not much confiding in the Townsmens doubtful minds, had with the souldiers possessed the Caffle. neither was he willing to trust himself in any of their Assemblies: Yet fearing if he betraved his Diffidence he might encrease their complaints, and by his absence give them occasion to joyn with the Romans, he came to discourse with them, where the time being spun out with disputation on and wrangling, the Romans, with the Mamertines their approbation, laid hands on him and cast him into prison. So being circumvented by craft, and frightned with menaces, when no other condition would be accepted, he was compelled to reftore the Mamertines their Caftle, and draw away his Garrison. . The Carthaginians upon intelligence of the businesse, were above Valer. Maxim. measure exasperated, and (whereas otherwise they used to punish their Commanders for evil counsels though they prospered) exclaiming both against the folly and cowardize of Hanna

Polybius miserably crucified him, and immediately sent both sea and land forces to Mesana with another Hanno, the ion of Hannibal, to order affairs in Sicily: He drawing his forces together at Li-Diodori Eclog. lybeum, marched to Selinuns, where pitching his Camp, he left his foot army and went to Agrigentum, and (having fenced the Castle there) he drew the people, being friends to the Carthaginians, into arms against the Romans: From whence being returned to his Camp. Embas. fadours came to him from Hiero, who being no whit content with the Romans arrival into Sicily, Polib. .. 1 thought this the fittelt leafon wherein joyning forces for a time with the Carthaginians, both they and also the Barbarians in possession of Messana might be driven out of Sicily. Having therefore had discourse with the Carthaginian General, they easily agreed to enter into conse-Diodori Eclog deracy against the Romans, who had supplanted both to their equal losse, each of them having failed of their hopes of Messana: 'twas ordered they should joyntly beliege Messana, and suffer no part of Sicily to be subject to any power but the Carthaginians or Syracusans. So the Carthaginian Commander with his whole strength moved against the Mamertines, having first sent an Herauld to charge the Romans. If they would be effeemed friends of the Carthaginians to depart Messana, and within a time prefixed to quit Sicily. The thips were commanded to keep their station about Pelora; the foot army fortified their Camp at a place not farfrom Meffana, called Cubilia, in the Greek toungue Euval. Hiere likewise, according to agreement, came with his Syraculant Army, and laid fiege to the Citie on the other fide, about the Hill Chalcidical fo the Citie, being round begirt, could not fafely receive fuccour either by land or fee About the fame time, when the Herauld brought back no peaceful answer from Melana; the Carthaginians, parely out of auger, partly out of digract, criefly put to death all their Disdori Eclos Mercenary fouldiers which were Italians by Nation. These things were no sooner heard at Rune; but the Conful Appins was forthwith fent with a strong Army to Rhogium, thence he fent some before, to treat with the Carthaginians and Hibro about breaking up the fiege, in the mean time, feeing the feas fo ftrongly guarded, he was very folicitous and intent in contriving how to cross over with the least danger. The Conful's Embassadours brought back no friendly asswer Diedori Eclog. from the Carthaginians, but were by Hiero with an accurate oration sharply reprehended, he first having recounted the many good offices he had done the Romans, proceed faying, 'I am 'in doubt, Romans, whether I should grieve for my self or for you; I indeed have lost friends of

' you somewhat worse then I took you to be, but ye have lost that Reputation of Justice and Integrity for which ye were to famous among all Nations. With the Mamertins ye never had any friendship or society, ye had heretofore League with the Carthaginians, and lately entred into one with Me. Being now willing to breake these Leagues, can ye give an account, by what 'injury from us, or merit of the Mamertines ye are thereunto provoked ? But because the "Carthaginians are able to speake for themselves, omitting what concerneth them, I shall at pre-Diodori Eclog. fent put you in mind of things in reference to my felf alone. The Mamertines your good "Country men, did, as you know, receive pay under the Syraculan Banners, and being dif-' mifed for their Returne for Italy, after they had been entertained as freinds and Companions by the poore credulous Messenians, committed a most horrid fact, as hath not been remembred by man, flaying in the night time their Land-lords, and keeping in their own power, their goods, wives , children and the Citie it felf. Which unleffe your felves (being of the fame opinion with other men) had judged to be a most vile and execrable villany, you would not so severely 'have punished the self same fact of the Campanians committed upon the Rhegians, by the Mamertines Example. By the same indignitie therefore wherewith ye were moved to take revenge of wicked villanies, by the same am I moved not to let the Mamertines goe unpunished; especi-'ally seeing they have since committed so many Robberies almost all Siess's over, burying as it were the memory of their first offence with others afterward committed. For (to omit other things) in that they destroyed the Cities of Camarina and Gela, then under the Syracusan protection, is reason sufficient why I should with a Just and pious War prosecure the boldnesse of such "most impudent Men. If ye therefore undertake to defend them because, being born in the fame Isaly, they are as it were your kinfmen, how much more justly might you have spared the Rhegians which were your fellow-Citizens? When in the taking of Rhegium I helped you with Auxiliaries and Provisions, how should I possibly then Divine that ye would hereafter hinder me when I should upon as just causes betiege Messans? But what need I use many 'words? if you have any care left of your reputation and faithfulneffe, if any fense of honefty, 'at least if any shame, I ought not to doubt but that you will with your forces rather affish me 'in my just cause then oppose me. But if the consideration of these things seem light unto you, however the event of war be doubtful, 'tis most certain all the world will plainly understand, That the Romans were incited to bare arms against us, not out of any colour of Justice and E-'quity, not by any injuries received (for that ye can no way pretend) not out of any pity or good will to the Mamertines, but meerly by their own ambition, and inordinate defire of adding this Noble Island to their Empire.

When this answer was returned, Appius having observed that so strong a Navy guarding the passage he could not without manifest danger cross over, plotted a very subtil and cunning device, he faid, He did by no means desire shat Hiero should be alternated from the Romans, that the Frontinas war was not decreed against him, neither could be projected without the peoples command. At a strategen 1.4 day therefore appointed he commanded his Sea-men to be ready, having their ships prepared for the voyage as if he would fail home. Now he was not ignorant that there were many both Carthaginian and Syracusan souldiers in the Rhegian Port, under the pretence of being Merchants, by whom he thought this news would quickly be conveighed to those who would have it true. And it hapned accordingly as he had foreseen for he no sooner had entred into his ships on a clear Sun-shinie day, and sailed along the Italian shore, but presently news was carried to the Carthaginian fleet which guarded the feas, whereupon they now not fearing the enemy would make any attempt that way, left the passage open, sailing themselves likewise away whither it pleased them. The Conful, who had forethought it would so come to passe, steared his course backward in the Zonaras night time, and arrived in Sicily with his whole Navy, no body so much as observing, much

It was a bold Enterprize and full of hazard, for an army unskilful in sea-affaires, in the night time, blindly to venture with rude and illbuilt ships through a sea dangerous in it self, Polyb. 1.14 though it had not been dark, nor any enemie to be feared: And the exploit was thought worthy to be made known to Posterity, by a new Cognomen thereupon given to the Conful. For, because he made use of many vessells, made of the Trunks of trees, for the transportation of his sences de Brev fouldiers, he was, in admiration of the fact, by the simplicity of that age sirnamed Candex, virz.c.13 which signifieth the trunk of a tree. For the Romans having no use of sea affairs, had neither Polyb. 1.20 any covered thip or long boate, or good skiff in a businesse of such concernment as this was; but made use of those Trivemes which the Tarentines and Locrians had lent the Eleats and Neapolitans, together with little veffels of Traffick of fifty Oars. But Appins landing not far from the place where the Syraculaus had pitched their Camp, Encouraged his fouldiers and declar ing to them, The Pillory would be certain if they came upon the Enemy unawares, immediately proceeded to affault their Camp. Hiero being awakened with the fudden tumult, marched out with what forces were ready; for a time the fight was very sharp, the Roman horsemen were beaten back, but the Legions floutly standing to it, Hiero was overthrown, and with his men Politics 1.11 fearfully retreated into his works. Appius having commanded the dead bodies to be plunder'd. entred into Messana, freeing the Mamertines from great feat, and filling them with better hopes for hereafter. Hiero feeing himself beaten before he could see the enemy (as himself afterwards Zonaras confessed) and suspecting that the Carthaginians had betrayed the passage over the sea, when Florus 2... he had revolved many things in his doubtful mind, began to be in fear of the main chance, and in Diodori Ectog. the dead time of the next night he drew his army out of their Frenches, and marched directly Paph. 1.12 without halting to Syracule. When he was gone, Appin thoughtfit to make use of the terror 2005. of his late Victory in vanquishing the Carthaginians also, and having ordered his souldiers to Poppius. refresh themselves in time, marched out in the dawning of the day to affault the Carthaginian Camp, which was pitched in a very fafe place, by nature and art diligently fenced, for on one fide the fea, on the other fide deep Marithes and Bogrencompaffed it in the form of a Penin. Zonaras Jula: That narrow space of ground where was passage to siem land was senced with a strong wall against all assaults. Here the Roman souldiers, beginning the storm, could not prevail against the strength of the place and multitude of defendants, but being beaten back with darts

Many times it hapneth in war that ill fuccess in the beginning giveth occasion of better fortune, while they who are worsted endeavour with better advice and more courage to make up their loffe, and the enemy on the other fide being bewitched with a flattering opinion of felicity, and taking no heed against siture chances, are carried away with rashnesse, as at this time it came to paffe to the Carthaginians, for they not being content to have repulled the enemies, iffued out of their Camp and purfued them as if they had fled, thinking the Romans had yielded not fo much to the difficulty of the place, as to their virtue and courage

When therefore they were come out of their works, the fortune of the fight changed with the place, and a great number of them were flaine, fome fled into the Camp, others as they had convenience into the Cities round about, neither durft they any more fit out of their polities Camp as long as Clandius was at Mossana. Hiero likewise sent a friend of his to consult about the businesse, and the discourse being on purpose drawn out in length, the Cousul had time to bring his men into a place of greater fecurity: The Syracufans likewife following the fame example, had many treaties of peace with the Romans, and indeed an agreement had been made but that Hiero was unwilling to be the author thereof. In these affaires the greater part of the year was spent; then the Consul returned to Messana, where leaving some forces to protect the Mamertines , with the relt of his men he croffed over to Rheginm : From thence he went to Rome to his Triumph which he made, over the Carthaginians and Hiero King of Sicily, with great joy of the People, as being the first over a Forreign Nation. This was the first of the Romans designes by sea, and such was the successe of their undertakings in Sicily. But these things and the actions of following times are much corrupted by the ambition of writers the cheife where of, Philinus Agrigentinus, and Fabius Pillor, the one striving to advance the Carthaginians Glory, the other the Romans, they both neglect their duty, and the truth of History; Whose Levity Polybins deservedly reprehends. For if even in private causes it be held an accursed Crime to circumvent any one by false Testimony; the author of an history is certainely to be effeemed more fouly perfidious if he corrupt the acts of Princes and Commonwealths with falshood: He ought to value truth more then any earthly Commodity or his own life, and the leffe deserveth pardon in that he cannot alledge so much as any faire pretence for his Lyes, for if he durst not for some causes freely speak all he knew, he might certainely without danger Livie Epkom, have held his Tougue. performed by the Centors, Cn. Cornelius and C. But indeed the Commonwealth was made invincible and not to be overcome by any calamity or flaughter whatfoever, by the wife advice of Romutus (which was conftantly observed by posterity) in daily admitting new people into their City, infomuch that neither all the loffes received by Pgrrbus, nor their many fhipwracks in the first Punick war, nor the fights of Thrasimene and Canna in the second were able so much to afflict it, but that still she did rife more chearful, free and valiant out of all her trou-

Such divers events are necessarily consequent to divers institutions: For as in nature it is agreeable, that those bodyes who are to a competent measure daily refreshed with wholf me food, should be stronger and longer lived then those who content with their own natural ingenite moisture despise all nourishment from without: fo it stands to reason, that and the next year did furiously rage. Concerning which when they had consulted the books of Orofina the Sybills, "twas found the anger of the gods was the cause thereof. There arising therefore a suspition that their Religious affairs were not rightly handled, the Priests by diligent observation on and inquisition, found that many Chappels and Temples were converted into the use of pri- Aug. de Civ. vate men, and that Capparonia, a Vestal Nun, was guilty of Incest; she prevented her doom by Oroshus hanging her felf, but he who had corrupted her, together with those servants who were privy to the fact, were executed according to Law. The holy places were redeemed out of private hands to their wonted use. So having cleared the City in matters of Religion, the Fathers applied their minds again to the care of the Commonwealth; and because Etraria being appealed, there was no commotion in Italy, they ordered both the new Confuls to be fent into Sicily Zonaras with their Legions: the Confuls were M. For when af- na. ter their taking the City of the Adranites by ftorm they had laid fiege unto Centuripa, there

Thence the Confuls, marching through leveral parts of the Illand, fometimes with their forces joyned, fometimes afunder, as they faw cause, overcoming both Carthaginian and Syraculan, as often as they durst stand to the hazard of a Battel, spread their fame and Terrour

Peace. Netture were the Romans at an averte from maning nethuring with entertainty in the first him from the Carthaginana, effectally because thereby they might more eafily (hipply their Legions with Corne for food. For the Carthaginians having command of the feas, they could not Polybius have Provision from Italy, by which incommodity the former Conful reaped more trouble then from the enemy. But, when Hiero was once united to them, the Kingdome of Syracuse being very fruitful, would plentifully afford them all Necessaries. The Peace therefore was concluded on these Articles, That what places or prisoners Hiero had taken from the Romans or their Zonaras. affociates to floutdatefore which configured likebule new and sunder the Trom toe Komans or cour Polytins foodld without molestation raigne over Syracule and all Cisies under the Transform of mildtien; that he Diodori Eclog. the chief whereof were Acra, Lunnium, Megara, Elorus, Netini, Tauromenium. The Gaulaton in Embassadours being thence sent to Rome, the same Conditions were there confirmed, and the Polyb. Senate decreed that Peace should be maintained with that King, and after a few dayes Cn. Atia Tabula lins Calasinus propounding it to the people, they likewife affented. This League, being Distributions made for fifteen years, was perpetually kept enviolable: Hiero bearing fuch Respect to the Ro- Palphin. man Greatnesse and they so bountifully requiting his good affection, that neither of them had cause to repent of their friendship. Hannibal the Carthaginian, being come as far as Xiphonia Diodorus with his sea forces, to raise the siege of Syracuse, having intelligence of the Peace, returned with greater hast then he came. The Romans being now strengthaed by Hiero their associate Polybim. and fellow fouldier, made no delay, but quickly reduced many Cities from the Carthaginian Jurisdiction. Entred into Consultation about yielding themselves to the Romans, but were prevented by the Carthaginians; for they fulpecting what was in hand, fent away the cheife of the Citie as Hoftages to Lilybann, and took in good flore of Corne and wine and other provisions. About this time the severity of Octaciliw Craffus the Conful was of much advantage to the Roman Discipline, for those souldiers who being taken by Hannibal, had basely, for safeguard of their lives, submitted themselves to bondage, he caused to continue without the Camp to receive the first charge from the enemy, that fo, having no fence but their own courage, they might be the more valiant, trusting only in their 4 1 own courage, and not to any fecurity of the place they flood in. After these and other exploits of no greater moment, winter now approaching, the Confuls zonaras, disposing several Garrisons in convenient places, returned into Italy and so to Rome with the refidue of their Armies. There was a Triumph decreed to M. Valerins (whole fucceffe and Festi Capitalia pains had been most remarkable) over the Carthaginians and Hiero, which was performed the ni. fixteenth of the Calends of April. Among the spoils was brought a Clock, which is therefore

by Holislins fet up a Table, whereon was painted the Battel wherein he overcame Hiero and the Carthaginians, which before his time was not done by any man, but afterward by many, This Valerins had his Sirname Meffalla from Meffana; but I wonder that some Authors of no small VarreapudMa. note should imagine it was derived from his taking that City, whereas the series of affairs doth wobium Saturn evidently demonstrate, that it rather proceeded from his delivering that City from the troubles . it fultained (after Appins Claudius his departure) from the Carthaginians and Hiero, remove ing the one enemy and reconciling the other.

Nail, who was Cn. Fulvius, Cn.F. Cn.N. Maximus Centumalus, he chose for Master of the Horse Q. Marcius. Q.F. Q.N. Philippus. In the same year the Esernian Colony was planted whereas the year before one was deduced to Firmum, or as some will have it to Castrum. Af. ter this L. Posthumins, L.F. L.N. Megellus, and Q. Mamilius, Q.F. M.N. Vitulus were created Confols, and both of them had Sicily allotted for their Province: There were but two Legions allowed them, which were thought sufficient, because now having Amity with Hierothe war was more easie : they considered likewise that provisions would be the better procured if the Army were but small. The Confuls having transported their forces into Sicily, and being joyned with their affociates, paffing by things of leffer moment, thought fit with their whole strength to beliege Agrigentum, which City the Carthaginians had plentifully furnished with all manner of accommodations, intending it for the Magazine of their wars. For they feeing Hiero had forfaken them, and that the Romans made Sicily their chiefest care, they thought it behooved them to make the more diligent preparation for the war. In the first place therefore they fent the greater part of their forces into Sardinia, to lie in wait against the Italian shore. by that means to divert the Romans from Sicily, or at least to compel them to fend the smaller forces then otherwise they would have done. But being frustrated of their hopes (for the Romans had strength sufficient, both wherewith to guard their own Coasts, and invade Sicily with a new army) they hired many Mercenary fouldiers of the Ligurians and Gauls, but more out of Spaine, whom, together with great plenty of provisions, they fent to Agrigentum; resolving to make that heir Magazine of Corne and the Receptacle of their Armies; being, by reason of its conveniency of scituation, and multitude of buildings, fitter for fuch occasions then any other Citie of Sicilie of their Jurisdiction. The onely feat of War therefore being about that Citie, the Romans, having confined the Carthaginians within their works, pitched their Camp within a mile thereof. The grain was then ripe in the fields, and because they foresaw the siege would prove long, the soulders fent out to reape and being in Count, wandred tomewhat too far and more carelessly then ought to have been done having an enemy fo near. The Carthaginians omitted not to make use of this occasion, and had indeed given a great overthrow to the Romans, but that they regained as much by their courage, as they had lost by their negligence. For, when they who were fent out to forrage were not able to relift the affanit of the Enemy', the Carthaginians purfued them even to the Camp, where deviding their forces, fome prepared to storme the workes, while the others maintained the fight with the guards without. Then, as often at other times the Laws of warfare duely observed and the incorrupted Rigour of the Roman Discipline faved them from an hazard tending to the destruction of their whole army. For (it being a deadly crime among the Romans for any cause whatsoever to forsake their station) the guard without knowing it was to no pupole to fly back, though they were much overpowred in number. maintained the fight with wonderful courage, loling many of their own men, but killing more of the enemies, till the Troupes had time to arme themselves and come to their Relief, Enemie being there repulsed, and those who had now almost entred the workes surrounded, the Romans made a very great flaughter of them, and purfued the rest even to the Citic. This accident made both the Enemie more fearful of Issuing out, and the Romans more wary in their Forrage. Henceforth the heat of their Contention being not fo great as before, (for the Carthaginians feldom made a fally, and then only in manner pickeering and light skirmish) the Romans thought fit to divide their forces; and plant their Camps on two fides of the Citie, on the one fide near to Escalapias his Temple a on the other in the high way leading to Heraelea. Their Camps were fenced with Trenches on both fides, toward the Citie, against their Sallies, and toward the Country both to fecure themselves from any invasion, and to hinder Relief from entering the Citie. The space between the two Camps was guarded with many companyes of soul-

In all these affaires they were much affished by the Sicilans, who lately had made friendship with them, of whom together with the Romans there were an hundred thousand. They brought provisions as far as Erbessus, from whence (it being not far off) the Romans setched it into their Campe. Whereby they had very great plenty of all Necessaries. At this stay the siege continued for almost five moneths, neither much prevailing over the other (for they attempted nothing but light skirmishes) till at length the Carthaginians began to have the worst on't. For a great number of men, little leffe then fifty thousand warriers, having been so long shut up in one town, had spent almost all their corn, and saw no likelyhood of procuring more, the Romans guarding all the passages; so that they were much afflicted both with their present miserie, and expectation of suture. Therefore Hannibal the son of Gesco (who was Commander in chief at Agrigentum) by many messengers craving relief against hunger and other dangers. Hanno the elder was fent into Sicily with some Elephants and Souldiers which were for that pur- Peli him pose raised. His Army consisted of fifty thousand foot, fix thousand horse, and threescore E- Distort Edog. lephants, with which forces he failed to Lilybaum, thence he marched to Heraclea, whither forth- b.23 with came messengers promising to deliver up Erbessus to him. Being by their means made master with came meneringers promising of Erbell at (from whence the Romans hitherto had all their provisions) he feemed to have efferded a businesse of great moment, as much afflicting the Romans now for want of necessaries as they had done the Agrigentines.

And now the Romans began to confult about raising the siege, which they were very near giving over for a desperate business, had not the King of Syracuse, by trying all wayes made a shift by sealth to convey to them some corn and other commodities, whereby their present want was in some measure relieved. Hanno considering the Romans now to be faint with hunger and other infirmities following it, whereas his own men were well and lufty and in perfect ftrength approached near the Romans, refolving, if occasion were offered, to fight them. Marching therefore with his fifty Elephants, and whole army from Heraclea, he fends his Numidian horfmen before to play about the enemies Camp, to provoke the Roman horimen, and, if possible, to draw them out into ambush. The Numidians according to order carelessely flying about the Conful's Camp, the Romans issue out, beat back those who opposed, and pursued them as they fled out of order, that way which they knew Hanne to be coming. The further they followed the pursuit, the more difficult was their return to their own works, infomuch that many of them were loll after they had met with fresh forces, which caused those who fled likewise to turn and fight. Hanno being by this much encouraged with hopes of the main Victory, placeth himself upon an hill called Torus, about a mile and a half distance from the Roman Camp; neverthelesse the battel was deserred longer then was expected between two Armies so near one the other; sometimes the Carthaginian, sometimes the Roman unwilling to hazard their whole fortune in one battel; while Hanno was defirous to fight, the Romans contained themselves within forcine in one oatter, while they were exceeded by the enemy both in number and chearfulneffe, being themselves terrified and dejected with the losse their horsemen had sustained.

But when they, (feeing their affociates troubled and daunted at this their fear, the Enemy on the contrary grow more confident, and thinking it better to fight with the Carthaginians then endure such want) were resolved upon the Battel, then Hanno began to fear, and decline the encounter. Two months were thus frent; nothing of greater moment being performed, but Pobbins light skirmiffies which happened every day. At length, being moved with frequence surreating from Hannibal, who had daily fent out Messengers, and by lighted fires given him often notice. That the belieged were no longer able to endure hunger; and that many were thereby compelled to flee to the enemy; Hanne was resolved no longer to defer the battel, giving or- 201414. der to Hannibal at the same time to issue out of the City. The Consuls having intelligence here. Fronting Rick. of, kept themselves very quietly within their Camps ; Hanno the more furiously presents him - 2.1 felf in Battel array, marcheth up to their very Works, boldly provokes them to fight, reproaching them with fear and cowardize. They on the contrary being content to repulse the enemy from their Trenches, neither ranged battel against them while they stood, nor pursued them when they retreated. When things had been thus transacted for some dayes together, and the Carthaginians were fully perswaded the Romans durit not venture on any further action, L. Passbumius the Conful wifely made use of the enemies security and contempt to his own good. For filently ordering his whole battel within the works, when the Carthaginians according to their mishes from day break till noon, then the enemy withdrawing themselves, he brought forth his Legions and made a charge upon them. Hanno, though he faw a necessity of fighting contrary to his expectation, stougly entring into battel , maintained it doubtful till the day was almost fpent. But the Romans , having on purpole well refreshed their bodies and prepared them to fight, were not so much troubled with heat, thirst and Labour as were the Carthaginians; who, before the battel, being weary with failing and standing all day, the longer they fought, were the leffe able to relist by reason of the weaknesse of their Bodys. At length the Mercenary fouldiers who stood in the front were no longer able to endure the brugs, and did not only give back themselves, but falling in difor-derly upon the Elephants and other Regiments behind, routed the whole battel and caused them to fly before the enemy who so hotly charged them. Things were managed with the same successe in the other place, for Hannibal, issuing out to fight, was beaten back with the great- Zonares er losse, and sorced into the City again. The Carthaginian Camp was taken, three Elephants Disderi Edog. wounded, thirty stain, eleven came alive into the Romans hands: The men had the same for bas tune, for of fo great an Army very few escaped with their General to Heraciae; they who Orofinia. 7 were shut up in the City, seeing no way or means of safety lest them, were afflicted with very Zonaras great terror and despair : When Hannibal following the best counsel his ill fortune had lest him, observing that the Romans, what with wearinesse of their late fight, and joy of their Victory, Poybins in the mean time made no refiftance, for befides their late ill fuccesse they were vexed with the fedition of their Mercenaries, the Gauls being chief in the Mutiny for want of many moneths pay; for the punishment of whom, Hanno devised this stratagem, first soothing them with fair speeches he desires them, At present for a while to be quiet, telling them, He was in certain hopes

OUR years were now expired fince the Carthaginian war began, neither had the Romans any cause to complain either of their own courage or fortune; for they were Victors in every battel, both over Carthaginians and Syraculans as often as they durit encounter: They had taken many rich Cities by florm, and others upon Articles submitted themfelves; but as long as they waged war in an Island, they could not at their pleasure find previous and acceptable and decented. And the Carthaginian ships with free and unexpected arrival being themselves fecure, did not only moleft and vex the Sicilian Cities upon the fhore, but likewise wasted the coasts of Italy , both to the losse of the Roman Empire, and likewise to Pophine. their difference; whereas the Affrican shore was clear and free from the enemies invasion. The Senate therefore and people of Rome diligently confulting upon the matter, did refolve to prepare a Fleet, and fight the Carthaginians not only by land, as hitherto they had done, but to try their fortune at fea alfo. This was the very first serious thought the Romans had concerning fea affairs, which they accomplished with as much Courage and good Fortune, as they had coneeived it with Wisdom and Resolution: Insomuch as the Empire of the whole world might well be judged due to the Romans, who being willing by sea to encounter a people most skilful in sea affairs, wanted neither Boldneffe to attempt it, nor Diligence to manage it, nor Constancy effectually to perform it. For the Romans to that day being so utterly ignorant of sea affairs, that there was not a man amongst them who ever had seen one, neither had any one Man of War of their own, or any Carpenter who knew how to build one, yet having with great confidence undertaken the defign, they did in a very fliort time both learn to fail and venture to fight and overcame those people who for many ages had had experience in sea affairs,

The care of building the ships was committed to Cn. Cornelius L. F. Cn. N. Scipio Afina, oropa. and C. Dmilius, who had newly entred the Consulship. They had one Carthaginian ship of five Oars; which Claudins took with his foot army (at what time he was studying to passe Aust de viris over into Sicily) while in heat of fight it came too near the shore and was grounded upon the Illus. c. 37 fands in a shallow place. The Consuls ordered the whole Navy to be built after that Patterne, Plinie 16.39 and fo diligently profecuted the work, that in threefcore days after the timber was felled, they Plans 2.3 had threefcore thips standing at Anchor. But the Confuls hastned their expedition no less by their wit, then by their Industry, For, (being neither willing to hazard to fight with men unskilful at the oar, nor yet to ftreighten the time allotted them for action in training up and exercifing men on purpole) they contrived a device, which though it may at first shew seem ridicu-lous, yet in the use and event proved exceeding Commendable, That, while the ships were in building, their Men should fit on shore and there be taught their office how to Rowe. For being placed in the same order as they were to observe in the ships, and a Boatswaine being set in the midit of them, they were commanded, at his word given, to move their Oars, and again to forbear, even as if they were failing.

By this exercifing themselves in fancy onely they were so improved, that when the ships were ready, after a few daies real paines-taking, the Confuls were willing to trust themselves what ships soever they light, so pierced the planks thereof that they held them fast against their wills; The Roman fouldiers, if the ships were fastned fide to side, did on every part leapin and affault the Enemy; if they were joyned onely in the foredecks, they went two by two over the bridge annexed to the timber, with fo much the more facility, because on each side of the bridge a little fence knee high, made their passage safer, and their footing more secure : They who went foremost, holding their bucklers before, defended their faces from the Enemies darts, those who followed held their fhields down to the little sence, so guarding their sides, and entring the Enemies ships; so that the fight was not performed with the Beakes of ships, but with fwords and hands, like to a fet Battell; The Romans therefore excelling in strength and Courage, had an easy victory over men lightly armed, and trusting more in the nimbleness of their ships, then in their hands; They quickly forced thirty Carthaginian ships, among which the Admiralls frigot was taken, but Hanniball leaping out of his ship, when it was now taken, into a Cock-boat escaped Captivity, and sending a trusty friend in post-haste to Carthage, to prevent the News of his Overthrow, did thereby cunningly decline that Capitall punishment which otherwise had attended him. the like fault to his greater shame, in that the fresh example of the Consul's incogitancy did not learn him to be more circumspect. He had understood that the Roman Navy sailing by the Italian shore, was putting forth to sea, and that they could not now be farre off. Desiring therefore, as neer as might be, to observe it, that he might occurately know the number of their ships, their swiftness, and in what fashion and plight their new made Vessels werein, he failed forward with fifty ships, not forefeeing any danger, his ships being consusedly mixed

without any order, as when they ride in Harbour or any fafe place: At the turning therefore of a certain Promontory, suddenly falling into the Roman Fleet, which came prepared and failing in good order, he was vanquished before he could prepare himself to fight, and having lost the greater part of his Navy, himself likewise being in great Danger, he very hardly escaped with the reft. The Victorious Navy, understanding Cornelius his mishap, sent Messen gers to C. Duilius to give him notice of their approach, and prepared themselves for fight, having intelligence that the other Carthaginian ships were not farre off. There while they deligently considered the inconvenience of their own Vessells, that they were rudely made, and farre inferiour to the Carthaginians in swiftness, it came into the mind of a certain ingenuous man to invent an Engine, whereby to lay hold and keep fast the Enemies ships; which Engine they afterward called a Raven or Crow; the fashion of it was this, There was a straight round piece of Timber, four ulnes long, some nine inches Diameter, having at the end thereof a pully or windlase, to which, being fixed on the foredeck, there was fitted a bridge, fix ulnes broad, and four feet long, made of plankes fastned together with iron nails. In this Engine

there was left a long hole whereby it might be fitted to the piece of Timber, by the space of states was ten a roug more wineter or in might be intend to the piece and the bridge or lader, which was not inferted in the Timber, being of two ulnes long, was so faithed by hinges, that it might be pulled up, or let fall; to the end of the bridge was affixed a strong sharp piece of iron, with a ring at it's head, whereto a rope being tied, through the pully of the timber, it might be drawn down into the Foredecke; Then as they lifted, by the Rope they could draw it up, or let it fall down, with its sharp piece of iron laying hold on and keeping fast whatsoever it fell upon. In the mean time the Confull C. Duilius, committing his foot Army to the Charge of his Colonells, came to the Navy, and understanding that the Enemies spoiled the

Their Towns are not very great nor very populous, yet there is above thirty of them, the principal whereof are Aleria a Colony of the Phocaans, and Nicea of the Etrurians. The Air is here very troublesome, and therefore the feas rough. The Carthaginians therefore had long wars with these nations, and obtained the dominion of both Islands, except places inaccessible. But because wild and rude men were easier to be vanquished then tamed, they bethought themselves of many means whereby to keep them under, they likewife corrupted all the fruits of the Island, and under pain of death prohibited the Natives to fow or plant any fuch thing, that they might be forced to fetch all necessaries from Africa, till at length grown somewhat more gentle they learned with patience to bear the voke.

To these Islands at this time did Cn. Cornelius stear his course, and first in Corsica stormed the City Aleria, after which without much labour or danger he took the reft. From thence as he failed towards Sardinia, he met the enemies Fleet, which he prefently put to flight before they came to grapple. After this he went to Olbia, where feeing many Carthaginian ships in the Haven, and thinking himself not strong enough in foot to storm a City so well scituate, and defended by a great multitude, for the present he omitted the business, and failed home for a

Many out of the new conquered Nations, were pressed for sea service, whereof there were then sour thousand in Rome. made of the Constitution of the service with Condition and so far exasserated one another that they were resolved to burn the Citie and plunder it: They had already drawn in above three thousand accomplices into the conspiracy, which daily gathered more strength, when Erius Potelius, Commander of the Auxiliaries, did by his wildom prevent all danger. For he feigning himself engaged in the same saction, was made privile to all their Contrivances, he was acquainted with the number of them, nay, with the nation, and name of every particular person in the conspiracy; he knew the place and the time where and when they intended to act any thing. He now wanted nothing to the accomplishment of his own private defign, but onely to discover theirs to the Senate, but thither he could not find no opportunitie of going, because the Samnites would never suffer him to walk alone; at length having devised this trick, he perswadeth them, That when the Senate next met they (hould come by bands into the market-place, and complain that they were cheated in the Measure of their Corn, that then they stoud have occasion offered of executing their Purpose, or at least understand of what mind and opinion the Fathers will be in upon such sudden motions and fire And to gaine the more Credit in the business, he went along with them, manifesting himself not ony a Companion in the Tumult, but the Author and Ringleader of it. Whereupon being called into the Senate he discovered to them the danger of the secret Plot and cause of his own diffimulation. The Fathers, taking no notice of what they knew, fent Messengers with good words to pacific the Rout, and command them home, affuring them with all, That the Senate would take order for Redreffe of their Grievance, and that every one should enjoy bis Right. The Conspiratours, thinking their Designes was still kept close, went their way: The night following every Matter bound his fervants, whom according to Positive his Information, he knew guilty of the treason, the Samnites also were most of them seized upon in their Quarters. Either the care of this or some other business, or sicknesse was an hindrance to C. Florus, that he did not goe into Sicily fo foon as ordinary, whereby Hamilear after his last Victorie had time much to encrease the Carthaginian Power there. For having taken Camarina and Enna by Treachery, he fortified Drepanus, where was a very fair Haven, and enlarged it in forme of a Town, bringing the Erycines thither to Dwell, whose Citie, lest it should be servicable to the Romans he totally demolished, excepting the Temple of Venus. After this he reduced many other places under his power either by deceit or by force, and was in a likelyhood of conquering all Sicilie, but that Florus, for this reason not daring in winter to forfake the Iland, tarried to oppose him. ing vehemently hot, Hanne couragiously fighting, seeing his own party worsted, rushed in to the thickest of the Enemies and was there flaine: After which the Town yielded it self. The Conful much graced the fame of his Victory by his fingular humanity toward the Enemie. For he took care to have the Body of Hanno to be conveigned out of his Cabbin to Burial, Fal Maximut, and made a large Funeral for him , laying afide hatred after Death , and rightly judging that 5. virtue is to be honoured even in an enemie. Then not suffering the Terrour of his late Victorie Silius b.6 to grow thate and be forgotten, he took many other Cities of Sardinia, furthering his Courage Frontinus with Counfells and stratagems. For he used in the night time to land some choice bands not far off those townes he meant to affault, who conveniently placing themselves in Ambush lay 3.9 63.10 quiet, till the Conful coming to the walls and giving an Alarum, had under pretence of Flight drawn the Townsmen a good way out of their works, then they in Ambush bastily ariseing took the Citie void of Defendants: By this wile he obtained many places, and so prosecuted his Archeivements, that the Carthaginian armies had no abiding place either in Sardinia or Corfica. Florus 2.2 For which cause, at his Return, there was no doubt made, but a most ample Triumph decreed him, which he made over the Carthaginians, Sardinia and Corfica the fifth of the Ides of Fafii, Capital, March, having brought great store of plunder out of those Islands and many thousands of Cap. The Carthaginians went out in the night time at break of day the Townsmen opened the Gates. But the Romans bearing too much in mind the Incommodities they had endured in the fiege thereof, flew every one they met without destinction of age or fex , till A. Acilius the Conful caused proclamation to be made , That both Plunder and Prisoners should belong to those who took them. Then at length Covetousness overcame Cruelty, and the rest of the Citizens were saved and made Captive: The Citie was plundered and demolished. The Army being thence led towards Camarina, fell into very great Diodorus danger, for want of knowledg in the Country. For the Carthaginian General meeting them Zonaras had first possessed the higher places, and as it were besieged the Romans rashly entred into a difadvants on the party and any thought they saw before their Eyes the very picture of the Agellina 2,7.

Whereupon the Garrison of Erbessus being disheartened, forsook the Town. So Erbessus came again into the Romans hands. The Confull Encouraged with this fuccels, and thinking that many of the Liparaans favoured him, advanced with his Army to their City: But there he had not the like Fortune. Then onely in this year Africa, which hitherto had been free from any miferies by an Enemy, began to be sensible of a war, when the Romans had made an invasion thereinafter they had in a great Sea fight gained the Victory over the Catthaginians fleet; winth aproximation and both the one and the other fortune of that fame Regulars, another wad not fuitable to the gallantry of the man; The year before when the Carthaginians, C. Aiilius being Consull, did so strive to get the best in a Sea-consict, that when they had lost many ships, they first gave over fighting; yet because they had funk some certain of the Roman Vessels, they would not take themselves to have been of lesser reputation; On the other part, the Romans did judge that event as an undoubted Victory. So it was that the vast multitude on both fides did bend their mindes with greatest emulation to the study of Sea-Affaires. And Polyb.1.25 therefore the Confulls being charged to remove the warre into Africa, when they were come to Orofins 4.8. Me Jana, with an Armado of three hundred and thirty ships, and from thence passing by the Pulyb. Coast of Sicily on the right hand beyond Pachinus, to take in the Foot Forces, they having alfo some Forts near the Hill Ecnomus, they failed forward. And about the same time Hamilcar General of the Carthaginians, and Hanno the Admirall, being Commanders of a Fleet of three hundred and fixty ships, having passed by Lilybaum in Carthage, and then Heracles Minous, in that bay they confult of calting Anchor, observing the motions of the Romans. and if they durst bend towards Africa, they were in a posture to stop their course; which when the Confulls were informed of, they with good advice make all things ready for either chance. that they might not be to feek for Counfell, whether they were to engage in a Sea-conflict, or to draw some whither for safety: therefore committing the ships to some of the soutest Soul-diers, they make sour Squadrons, as so many parts of the whole sleet; the choicest men they fet in the first Squadron, the two next Squadrons they place in their order, in the Reare guard they put their chiefest men for strength, the Triarii, these forces they dispose of in such array, that each ship did carry 300 towers, and six score Souldiers. So the Muster Roll in the whole Navy did amount to an hundred and forty thousand men. The Carthaginians did fomewhat exceed that number, leading more fouldiers then an hundred and fifty thousand. And indeed the Consulls did scarce esteem of any other fort of souldiers in comparison of their own. There was so much the more consulting, when it did appear, they must needs fight in the deep Ocean; where the swiftness of the ships, and the skill of the Pilots are of much advantage, to the fit ordering the front of the battell aray against that danger; finally they consider of placing the whole Fleet aright. They set two Gallies wherein the Confulls themselves were carried, very even in the Van, to both those Gallies they joyn on this fide the first Squadron, on that fide the second in a long continued row; the ships being placed in such manner, that the fore castles of them all were turned outwards, and the Gallies did move almost joyned together, the ships next to those did keep from each other more apart, and so consequently the space lest between the opposite ships did grow wider according to their being fet in order. So when the form of the Van in manner of a wedg was shaped, with small distance between the first ships, and with great spaces between the last then did they cause the third Squadron to advance, which bearing that open spacebetween the two first thips, did meetly by their order, exhibit a triangular form of the whole array; behind this, at the third Squadrons back, the long boats were drawn by a Barge with Cables to puil with, reaching to the ships of the Terrian fouldiers. The Triaris the fouldiers fet in the Rear-ward, did so inviron the former, the ships being stretched out into a halfe circle, that from each Wing they did appear; So the whole body with a deep hollow front, the hindmost parts being firmely folid, did refemble the fnout of a ship, not less able to receive a violent affault then lit to give one. But the Carthaginian Captains having intelligence by their Scouts of the approach of the Roman fleet, when they considered, the paffage to their City was not difficult, the common fortwere nothing manly, the bordering Neighbours inconstant, and very prone to fall from their fidelity, they conclude to go out to meet them : being refolved first to try all that might be, rather then they would fuffer, that the Roman Vessels should have a safe Voyage into Africa. Therefore they betake them to their thips, incouraging their men in thort, That they would undertake the fight with mindes firmely bent and chearfull, well remembring they were to fight, not only touching things prefent, but in reference to all things, which each one held precious at home; and with their own good hope, and that of their fellow Seamen, they lanch forth out of the Harbour; nor was the Romans fleet far distant, therefore not far from Heraclea they give the shock against each other with equals soutness; The Carthaginian Captains did so provide, that Hanno should charge on the Right Wing, (but it was he that had been unfortunate at Agrigentum) Hamilton should be Commander over the rest. And they also divide their ships into four Squadrons, having observed the array which the Romans had made use of: Of these, that which was the left Wing of the whole array being crooked like a bow, did make towards the shore, the rest were extended in their plain order, and turned upon the first Squadron of the Enemies ships. Hereupon the Right Wing in which there were very fwift Veffells with fnouts and five oares in a feat, Hanno did stretch it out all he could towards the main Ocean, being ready to furround the Enemy, if the skirmith should begin at any other part. And the Confulls not staying long did venture themselves with their two Squadrans into the midth of the Carthaginian ships; Himilear that he might break the array of the Romans did charge his fouldiers, when the Conflict began, they should present rake their stights, which being done, and the Roman porty professing them; the Carthaginians indeed had no hurt by their nying, in regard their ships were swift: but the array of the Romans, as Hamilear wished, and had forefeen, was rent afunder, when yet the Triarii, and the third Squadron did keen their places, which, when he faw it performed, he fuddenly gives a fign out of his own thip, that their fore caltles being turn'd, they should encounter those that did pursue them: the fight was doubtfull, the Carthaginians excelling in swiftness, and in skill for Navigation. The Romans being farre transcendant in the stoutness of their fouldiers; Therefore so long as the fight rather of the ships, then of the men, did last, the Carthaginians had the better clearly: But when they began to fight hand to hand, the ships being fastned close with grapling irons, then the Victory did certainly incline towards the Roman party: When the fouldier full of confidence through his hand-ftrokes, and fighting before the Confulls, did ftrive to approve his valour to them with a more notable endeavour: while the skirmish was to managed in that part, Hanno with the Right Wing, which hitherto he kept unmov'd made a fierce affault, being carried by the tide amongst the ships of the Triarii, and did create them much troublesom work, when they were brought to great diffres; At the some time almost, the Left Wing also of the Carthaginians, the first posture being changed, and with a front made even, does assail with dangerous beaks the third squadron of the Romans, which drew their long boats by a Barge. The Romans having flipt their Cables, did prepare themselves for refishance; Here also they shew much Gallantry: So in three places, there do happen even just so many Sea-fights, far distant from each other.

When they had fought so hard, the Victory long enough inclining to either fide, at last it chanced, as needs it must, where there is fierce bickeering in fundry places at once, with equall force and vehemency, that the felfe same part which is first routed, should cause the whole Victory. For when Hamilton was utterly unable any longer to withfrand the Violence of his Enemies, his fingle flight did immediately disperse even the whole fleet of the Carthaginian. For L. Manlins one of the Confulls, being very much busied about bringing together the ships that were taken, and chaining them to his own, M. Regulus espying the fight to begin afresh in another place, he made halte to relieve his own fide, taking to him the thips of the second Squadron, all that escaped out of the former fight fase and unshattered; The Triaris did soon perceive that reliefe, and recollecting their Spirits, which had even failed them in extremity of Danger, they began to oppose their Enemies with great undauntedness. Hanno, when he saw that both those before him made frout refistance. and that himselfe was so over-charged on the Reare with fresh supplies, hoising up sail he did his best to avoid his approaching overthrow. And when L. Manlin, amidit these tryalls beheld the third Squadron of the Romans to be enforced towards land by the Carthaginians Left Wing, he fleer'd that way, and M. Regulus overtook him unawares, who had even now fet the long boats and the Triarii out of harmes reach. So the flate of things is foon quite changed, and they are furrounded very close, who but just before had hemmed the Romans in. Whom indeed being strangely encompassed, and in a manner straightly befieged, they might e're this have utterly destroyed, unless not daring to go near them for fear of the iron raven-beaks they were wont to grapple with, they gave the Confuls time enough, that themselves being safe they might even secure their own side, and the Carthaginians, that were environ'd by a sudden surprizeall, had leisure to take, as with a net, sifty ships, and all that were therein, fo the other few flealing away by the very shore side did make their ef-

When this victory was over, returning to Messana they allotted certaine daies to mend their ships, and refresh their men, and to take in store of new provision. Amongst which, Zoneres. Hamilear when he would not yelld by any means, the Romans should go to Africa, but Pelybias wanted strength to stop their march , he betook himself to stratagems, and sought, by sending Hanno to them to fue for peace, to prolong the time, till the arrivall of the forces which he lookt the Carthaginians would fend him. Hanno when he made his addreffe to the Confuls, and heard the exclamations of the people, that the same decree ought to pass against him, which five years before the Carthaginians had defigned against Cornelius Afina then Conful, he thifted off the threatned mischief with a subtill answer, Verily if ye foul de fo (saies he) ye foul me be bester at all then the very Africans; and presently the Confuls well resented what he said, commanding those to be filent that had voted him to chains, and there was a voice heard well beseeming the gravity of the Roman stock , O Hanno, the faithful dealing of our City deet quit Val Max.6.6 thee from that fear. It was in vain to move for peace because the Carthaginian did not deal fincerely, and the Confuls did rather aim at Victory then at Peace. Therefore they had no mind to defer any longer their intended voyage to Africa; Neither did the Carthaginian Commanders croffe the delign, though they engaged to each other, not to endure the enmy should march Zonara without diffurbance, but to infest him from fundry quarters, and to bar his passage. But Han-Months and the Constitute of the Carthage beforehand, Hamilear not during to attempt ought tarries at Polybias Heraclea. The Romans ships made a fare voyage ree not non enemies and from campells. And Zonaras, there wanted not some that did strangely abominate any travelling far by sea, and the enemies coast, and the very name of Africa. Manning, an Officer among the fouldiers, did first begin Florus, 2.3, to speak ill of government, but Regulus was so incensed against him, that he threatned him that feourges, and the axe should be his lot, unless he would submit. So at length the Consul was obeyed, and the nearer and the greater fear did expel the dread of travelling by fea. The Promonobeycuant to the sich from the bolome of Carthage does fretch very far into the Sici- Polybins lian fea. That coast was first found out by the Roman ships, then after a little stay while the whole fleet came up together, the Confuls having passed by the coast of Africa, they arrived at the Citie Clupea. Here the fouldiers are exposed to hazard, and when the ships were put into harbor, there was a Trench drawn round for the more security. The Citie because it refused to surrender, was belieg'd, and presently through the timerousnesse of the Citizens it being either yielded or deferted (for 'tis reported either way) it was reduced to the obedience the Romans. But the Carthaginians though they did endure things truly harfn, and very strange, yet they Zonarus rejoyced at their weal, that they fared somewhat better then they expected: for when they Pulpina. heard what issue the Sea-fight had, they were sore afraid, least presently the conquering forces woold have been drawn even against Carthage it self. Therefore re-affuming some courage after their former fright, they were fully bent to make what strength they could to defend their City and the Suburbs thereof. Mean while the Confuls having fent mellengers to Rome which would acquaint the Senators what exploits had been atchieved already, and should befeech their advice touching new attempts, they make Clupes a Garrison, that they might make use of Zonarus that feat of war. And having fet a guard to defend the City and field adjoyning, they march. Polybins ing a great way forward with all their other forces, they utterly waste a very fruitful Country, which from the dayes of Agathorles had not feen the fword of an enemy; they destroy many goodly Villages, they force away whole droves of cattel, moreover they lead away by force above twenty thouland men, no man daring to gainfay; they also take many Towns by storm Zenarus or by furrender, wherein they apprehend feveral Revolters, and fet free many Roman Captives, that were taken in the late wars, amongst whom I believe even Cn. Cornelius to have been, that was chosen Consul again after two years were expir'd. While things are thus acted, they that were fent to Rome by the Confuls, return with Orders from the Senate. One of them was com-Polybins manded to quarter in Africa, with fuch confiderable forces as they held needful to be kept there. The other was required to bring back the reft of the fleet, and the refidue of the army to Rome. So Winter now drawing near, M. those two: They were not minded to call back Regulus from amidst his Victories, while he City 498. went on prosperously in Africa; and he was ordered by the Proconful to manage the War there. That decree of the Senate no one did worse resent, than he himselfe, for whose honour Livie. Epit.

Therefore in his Letters to the Senate he made that his grievance, and fet it as the main ground of his fuit, that another might succeed him in his Office, upon the death of his Bai-Stratagemat. liffe (he undertook to manure a piece of ground of feven Acres, which his Mafter had in Papi-Val. Such good orders were then inuse! Valefium But when I read of or relate these things and the like. I cannot chuse but recollect with my self, which is the more lasting recompence for virtue, a reward by Coin, or by commendation; by pounds, or by praise. M. Regulus his renowne does endure many ages after his death; the wealth of others hath perisht with their Masters, and oftentimes before them: In the mean feafon the Carthaginians having chosen two Generalls at home, Afdrubat, Hunno's fonne, and Boffar; they fent also for Hamiltar their third Commander in chief to come out of Sicily. Walls, as the manner heretofore had been, neither should the Roman souldiers be permitted to do what they lifted without any punishment. So when they were encouraged to wage War, the Army was drawn out.

In the mean time M. Regulus did march to all places near adjoyning, through which the River Florus, 2.2.

And the business was effected with so much difficulty, and with fo great terrour to Horse and Foot, that the souldiers did averre they had rather oppose Val.Maximus Carthage it selfe, then such another Monster. And the Camp could stay there no longer, but must shun the infected waters, and all the Country round about which was blasted with the contagious stink of his lying there. This was some shame to the pride of men, which are wont to think very fondly, that they can Conquer all things. Truely when M. Regulus was Generall, that had · been Conquerour by Sea and Land, one fingle Serpent when he was alive, did hold the whole Roman Army in plea, and being killed, he made the Army draw off. And therefore the Proconful did hold it no immodelty to fend the spoils even of this very Enemy to Rome, and to acknowledg with a publick Monument the greatness of his own fear, and his rejoycing at the victory. For he took order the skin of the beast should be taken off and carried to Rome, which is reported to have been an hundred and twenty foot long, and being hanged up in a certain Temple to have lasted even till the Wars at Numantia. When the Camp was remov'd from Bagrada, the Confull commanded the Army towards the City Adia, all Towns and Castles being won and demolisht that lay in their road.

But to Adu, which was hard to take, there was a certain way of laying fiege by the help of warlike engines. To the croffing of which, when the Carthaginian Captains did speedily make hafte they fate down on a certain hill, but full of wood and full of other impediments that was very near the Roman Camp. M. Regulus having well confidered the nature of the place, and what manner of enemies he had to deale with, when he faw their foot were not comparable to his, but that they put much confidence in their Elephants and horsemen, but such forces being very formidable in open fields by the inequality of the places would not be come at, and would be made very useless; he wifely taking some advantage by the folly of his enemies, before they could perceive and correct their error, determines to fall upon them in their own Tents. Wherefore encouraging his fouldiers, and diligently observing what reason did suggest, he goes out of his Camp before the dawning of the day, and does cause his army to advance towards the hill directly opposite, where the Carthaginians had pitcht their Tents. First of all, the audacious confidence of the Romans did even amaze the Carthaginians, which being far leffe in number did fer upon fuch a vaft army even in their own trenches, from a low place, and of great difadvantage. Then they were in the greater confusion even in this respect, because the horsemen and Elephants, from which they did hope for most assistance, were not only of no advantage, but did extremely hinder and diffurb them, and the very time did augment their trembling, that the Romans did fet upon them unawares, and most of them, as yet, being fast asleep, there Zonard fore many of them are put to the sword even in their hurs, the others stragling in their amazed flight, and not knowing where to hide themselves, were taken by parties set on purpose to Neverthelels the Carthaginians Mercenary fouldiers, the Spainards and the French, being in Polybinian fantly in a good posture, and fighting Couragiously on the other side of their bulwark it was doubtful a great while which would get the upper hand. The forlorn hope even now being put to the run, the whole Roman army had been overthron, if the horse from another quarter that were commanded to wheele about had not in the very nick of time charged the enemie on the reare that were pursuing those which sled. Then they also which a little before had deferted their station might now be railied up and encouraged to fight afresh. So the enemy being set upon on both fides, when he had for a long time with much gallantry made refiftance, he was constrained to cry quarter. When the Cartheginians saw what was done, immediately they fling themselves out of their Sconces, and fall to running with all the speed they could make, and indeed the Elephants and the horsemen when once they came into plaines they could retreat well enough and fafely too. The Conquerors having purfued the infantry formewhat far, they turn back at length to throw down their fortifications. In this Battel there were seventeene thouland of the Carthaginians that were flain, five thouland are reported to be taken prifoners, Orofina and eighteen Elephants. The successe of this battel did purchase the Romans much friendship Entrepints. not only from all the Countryes round about, but even from people that were most remote. And in few dayes about fourfcore walled towns vowed fidelity to the Romans. Whereas upon the Orofius. newes that Tunis fuch a fenced City was taken by Regulus, did even aftonish the Carthaginians that were greatly straitned before, and which was built twelve miles from Carthage, least it Livis 304 fuffer what ever they did there to be kept fecret from the enemy, then being a fair prospect both to the very City it felfe, and to the fea hard by.

And the terrible dread of their war with the Romans did not onely dance round the Carthaginians, but the Numidians also, out of an oil grouge being fitting up by a first exportantly took up arms, and by spoiling and fireing the Carthagunian towns, brought more terrour and milery upon them, then the Romans did. And the Boores from all parts flying for refuge to the City, did cause not only a huge dread, but also a great dearth, when such a multitude of people did devour a world of provision, and the evarice of the owners did conceale the plenty as yet in store, who gaping greedily for gain by that Common Calamity were full of hope the price of victuals would raise daily according to the decrease of their most necessary food. Whereupon it followed, the Embaffy of Mareus Regulus was hearken'd to with greater heed, who aiming at the honor of finishing the war, and fearing least some one that might succeed him with a new commission from Rome should prevent him, he moves the Carthaginians to Conditions for peace. To that purpose some of the prime Senators are sent unto bim ; but when they Zonard faw strange harsh conditions offer'd, and their businesse at a stand; they took their leave of M. Regulus, who was verily perswaded he had Victory by the hand. Sieily for footh, and all Sar-Argans, who was a surface of the freely home what Romans they had taken, to ran England dinia were commanded to yeeld, to fend freely home what Romans they had taken, to ran Urfanum, fome their own men, to bear the whole charge of the war, and to pay belides a pention by the year. They had other impositions, full as burthensome as these. That they should be confederates with the Romans for offence and defence; that they thould use but one great thip; But the Romans they should affift with fifty gallyes well appointed as oft as they should be required. The Embassadours being transported with wonder at such Articles, and thas Regulas might Disdorf Eclog. grant his vanquisht suppliants more milde conditions, he made this answer. Men must either b. 13 Conquer or crouch to those that subdue cheen. By the return of which words the Carthaginians

In that flate of affairs certain ships which were fent to wast some souldiers into Greece, did return when they had gathered up no finall body of Mercenary fouldiers; Among these there was Publish one Kanthippus, by race a Lacedomonian, who did couple the noble exercise of warfare with the discipline of his Country, wherein he had been well trained up from his youth. When the Commanders behold this IIniverfall Cheerfulness, they also taking heart thereby, resolve to give the Enemy another charge. and encouraging their fouldiers as opportunity did require, they march out against the Romans. even with almost twelve thousand Foot, with four hundred horse, and well nigh as many Elephants; that thing alone did perplex the Romans, that they faw the Carthaginians make their inroads through the plain fields, having changed their first design, avoiding all steep and craggy places: But being puffed up with pride through their constant felicity they fet at nought the fouldiers that Zonaris. were wont to vanquish, and Gracalus their Leader. And Regulas was not corrupted with that fawning poylon of fortune waiting on him. When he well confidered that he had routed the Sea Forces of the Carthaginians, and the foot Souldiers too, that he had taken almost two hundred Townes, two hundred thousand men, and that Carehage being fore streightned. might be enforced to furrender he denied them peace when they fued for it on reasonable termes. and wrote to Rome. in the Camp, even to the greater vanting of his confidence, paffing over the river that was in the midst. and distant from the Enemy even two hundred thousand paces. Xanthippus perceiving the indifcretion of the Roman Leader, did avouch this would be the very time, wherein he would performe what he had promifed the Carthaginians; for he had got the Romans even tired with long Marching where his heart could wish them; he nothing doubted the Victory would be certainly his own; the time also did seem most commodious for the fight, because the day now drawing towards the evening, the Africans knowing well all places thereabout, if they fhould be overcome, they because their expected better in the right, or if they should conquer, the night would not hinder the purful of the Victory. Therefore the Carthaginians confulting what was to be done, Xamthipput calling for the help of Gods and Men, that they might not lofe fuch a fingular opportunity he did earneftly perswade his men to undertake the Battell fo much the easier, because the fouldiers themselves trying out to Xanthippus, they did of their own accord with unufuall cheerfulness defire to encounter with the Enemy, therefore the charge of the main affair is granted to the Spartan, he drawes out the Army, and does exercise them af-

tween, the Elephants are fet in order, being drawn up as broad as that fquare body; on either Wing the Horse are placed behind these on the Right Wing, stands the main body of hired souldiers. The Army being fet in such array, he commanded the skirmishers, that having thrown their darts, they should stand in open order for the advantage of their own fide, and when their main body should joyn with the Enemy, they should violently break out again from the Wings, and faculd on a fudden furioufly flanke the Romans, when they were charging the opposite referve. On the contrary part Regulus having well drawn up his Army, when he faw the Elephants in the Front of the Carthaginians, he foon takes advice, he brings his fouldiers lightly armed to the Van, he lets the well Compact foot-Companies in the Referve, the Horse are drawn up in the Wings, the Army is slirme in respect of depth, but much narrower then before; fo that the chiefe danger being seared from the Enemies Elephants and Horsemen, they did indeed take a right course against the Elephants, but being in an open and Champain Country, there was room sufficient for the Morse to surround, the whole Army being so close compacted. The Fight was began by the Elephants, which Xanthippus commanded to be led against the oppofite Regiments, and the Romans making a great shour; set forward to meet them. The Horse were likewise engaged in both Wings; but there the Romans being much inseriour in Number, and not able to relift the Enemies charge, fled away. But the Foot which were of the Left Wing, (whether it were to avoid the Elephants , or that thereby they thought the more easily to obtain the Victory) charged the Mercenaries, and putting them to flight, purfued them to their very Camp. The rest of the foot had an harder taske against the Elephants, by whose vast bodies their ranks were disordered, themselves trodden under foot, and whole Companies like a falling house, struck down to the ground, yet the very thickness of the Battell hindred them from breaking through; till at last they were distressed on all parts, for the Flanks and Rear were galled by the Horse, the soremost who made a shift to break through the Elephants, were slain by the Enemy standing yet Entire and the light-armed men flying in upon them. There was no less execution done in the Flight, the Elephants and Numidian Horse pursuing them in an open plain place. Regulus with almost five hundred fouldiers was taken alive by the Enemy; of the whole Army Flores 1.2. there escaped but about two thousand (who had charged and put to flight the Mercenaries) Porth who beyond all Hope, by their halt, got lafe into Clupes; of the Romans and their Affociates Onwar. were slain about thirty thousand. Of the Carthaginians there were not many wanting beside diago. eight hundred of the Mercenaries, who had fought against the Lest Wing of the Enemy. When Europius the Army returned to Carthage after so great a Victory, carrying the Roman Generall Priso- Publius ner, a multitude of Citizens came out to meet them, others standing in the streets, or in their houses, beheld the spectacle with wonderfull Pleasure, which they durft lately scarce hope for: their mindes being not capable to believe fo great an Happiness attending them; For being of late so neer despair, giving not onely their Country, but very City for lost, they durft scarce believe to great a Change, though they faw it with their eyes: But they took most speciall notice of the Generalls, every ones eye and thought being fettled on them, looking sometimes on Xanthippus, Iometimes on Regulus, Extolling the greatness of their own Commander, by the Estimation they had of the other. He must of necessity be a gallant Man who hash overcome Terrour and Plague of Carshage, now of a sudden breaved of a numerous Arms, howing soft bis antient Fame and Liberty regether.

Their Admiration was encreased by the habit and Siline 6. Garbe of the Man, who under a small body, and none of the best lookes, carried a large and People. virtuous mind. For this Exploit Xanthippus had much glory, and withall as much envy, to avoid which he used as much art as in finishing the Warre, for whereas he might justly expect an everlasting reward of his good service at Carbbage, yet he resolved to leave those doubtful hopes and full of Treachery, and return home, before other mens affections, or his own fortune were Orefus 4.9. altered. For this is for the most part the disposition of men, that openly they profess the love of their Country, but really study their own private good; as long as their City being in lafety, they can obtain and quietly enjoy Honour and Riches, they pretend mighty love to their Country: But where there is danger lest they should bestow the same benefits on others for their egregious merits, they had rather want a man who doeth good to the Common-wealth, then have him in the least way hinder their private commodity: As long as they think themselves able to equall others, their envy is hidden and more remifs, but when they fee themselves farre exceeded, and that Honour duely given to others which they defired for themselves, then what they were not able by virtue to obtain, they feek it by Calumnies and Criminations. So that the best men have ordinarily most Enemies and are most subject to Treachery; But a Native of Pobb. the Country hath some remedy against this Evill in his Friends and kindred . A stranger being voide of all helpe and affiltance encreaseth the Matice of degenerate mindes by his being easy to be hurt, in that he is more exposed to Treasons, and may without any great labour or danger be offended, affronted and undone. That Xanthippus apprehended and confidered these things, the sequel do h evidently demonstrate, Tis reported he was drowned by some sent after him from the Carthaginians, who after so great a benefit received, hated the Author of it, who being Zoneras once dead, they thought it would quickly be forgot that their Countrey was preserved by a For Apple Others deny Xanthippus thus to have perished, yet confess the Treachery of the Carthaginians, who at his Departure allotted him anold fhip, full of Leakes, fairly pitcht over as if it had been sound, but that he discovering the Cheat, went aboard on another thip and escaped the danger. About the same time they committed another fact of no less Treachery, but much more cruell, by reason of the number that perished thereby. The Mercenarys in somewhat a tumultuous manner claiming a Reward of their paines taken, and happy Valour, were put into thips being made believe that in some other place they should have their Desire : But the Cap Livie 28.2. tains of the ships who had such private Order, landed them and left them in a Barreu Iland where being destitute of all helpe from man, without food, without ships, having famine on one fide, and the Sea on the other, they pined away and perished; a fowl and horrid kind of Death. Others referre this Fact to former times, when there was warre between the Syraculans and Carthaginians, and that the Iland was thereupon called Offodes, or the Bonie lland, it lieth Diedor, 5-11. in the main Sea beyond Lipara Westward. These deeds whensoever and howsoever performed. do nothing dilagree with the Carthaginians usuall Cruelty. And if thus they served their Friends and Affociates, it is no wonder, they were more then ordinarily severe against their Enemies. Other Prisoners indeed were somewhat tolerably well used, for they likewise had many Captives at Rome, for whom they intended to make an Exchange. But against M. Regulus. they could neither cover nor moderate their Anger, but vexed and afflicted him all manner of wayes; they allowed him food which was neither pleasant to the Palate, nor strengthening to the Body, but which with much adoe by a flitgh nourishment served to produce his Miserable life. But more grievous were the Contumelies and Reproaches daily heaped upon him, amongst the rest, they would frequently on a sudden introduce an Elephant, to fright him with the noise and ugly shape of it, not suffering him to rest neither in Mind or body, and being thus milerably handled, and brought low, they cast him into the com-

When these things were heard at Rome, the City was filled not only with great grief but with fear alfo; for they miltrufted leaft the Carthaginians, provoked with the fense of their own calamities, and encouraged by this victory, should recompence them in the like kind, and dare to come even to the walls of Rome to inflict on them the same milchies themselves had suffered The Senate therefore commanded the Confuls, To strengthen Italy as diligently as might be with Sufficient Garrisons, themselves with a vast Navy to fail into Sicily, and thence if they thoughe fi into Africa, to divert the Carthaginians from any expedition into Italy. But the Carthaginians in the first place made it their care to reduce those Cities which the Romans had possessed to punish those Africans who had revolted from them, and by strength of arms to vanquish those who persisted in rebellion. Clapea was indeed by the Romans stoutly defended, but in Numidia, and over the other Africans (though their war was great) their victory was In the mean time, understanding that a great Fleet was preparing in Italy, they left the siege

endeavour'd to prevent the Romans from landing on the African shore. The Consuls used such incredible diligence, that by the beginning of Summer they had three hundred and fifty ships ready fitted and laden, with which failing to Sicily, when they found all things fafe there, and no danger, but that they were full of expectations and fears, they left Garrisons where most need was, and with the reft of their army steared towards Africa. But being by a tempest forced upon Coffera (an Iland between Africk and Sicily, near the Promontory of Lilybaum) they wasted the grounds there, took a City of the same name, and placeda Garrison in it. Then they fer forward to the Promontory of Hermeus, which being in the mid-way between Carthage and Clapea, shutteth in one side of the Carthaginian Gulf. At this place the Carthaginian

Navy met them, and a very tharp fight was entred into on both fides, when help came to the

Romans from Clupea, which totally inclined the victory, being before doubtful. An hundred and four of the Carthaginian thips were funk, thirty taken, and fifteen thouland fouldiers loft;

on the Roman fide eleven hundred men were loft, and nine ships. The fleet then failed to Utica.

where they landed their men, and pitched their Camp near the City, The Carthaginians likewife brought their forces thither under the conduct of Hanno, where in a land fight they were overcome with the loss of above nine thousand men. There were some Noble men taken prisoners, whom the Consuls reserved whereby to redeem M. Regulus and others who were in the like condition. They then consulted on present affairs, and conceived great hopes

and spoiled, they, fearing a famine, thought fit to return into Sicily, together with those Romans who had defended Clapea. They carried away very vaft and rich spoils, which had been laid up in Clupes in the time of Regulin his prosperity, and much encreased by late victories.

They had a lafe Voyage into Sicily, and sufficiently fortunate had been the Consuls if they would have fet a bounds to their happinesse. But because in their return to Italy they thought by the by to take some Port towns of Sisily, not regarding the ship-masters counsel (who advised them. Not to fail in those dangerous and rough seas against the coast of Africa, now Orion and the Dog Star were rifing) they suffered such shipwrack by tempest as hath hardly been heard infomuch as the whole shore, even from the coast of Camarina (where the storm began) to Pachynus, was filled with the Corps of dead men, and horses, and pieces of broken ships. In this their hard distresse the humanity of King Hiero was no small comfort to them, who bountifully entertained them, furnishing them with cloths, and victuals, and tackling for their ships, and conducted them fafe to Melana. But the Carthaginians made no delay to take advantage of this their misfortune, they presently regained the Hand and City of Coffura; and forthwith

croffing over into Sicily belieged Agrigentum under the command of Carthalo, and no relief coming, they took it and demolished it: A great multitude of persons were here flain and taken priloners, the others, who escaped through the midlands into the territories of Syracuje, planted themselves in a Village near the Temple of Jupiter Olympus. Neither were they out of hopes of recovering the whole Iland, but that the Romans affociates confirmed and firengthe-ned themselves against present sears, hearing what diligence was used in preparing a new Navy;

Val.Max.6.9.11 Cornelius was a great example of the Inconstancy of Fortune, and of Patience in Adversity for having seven years agoe, when he was Conful, been circumvented by the craft of the Carthaginians, and fuffer'd captivity, imprisonment and chains, and whatsoever milery is incident to mankind, he now refumed not only the other Ornaments of his degree, but likewise the Con-fular Dignity with so much the more joy, by how much the sadder missortune he had been before bereaved of them. The Confuls having arrived at Messana, and joyned to themselves what ships they found there, being chiefly the Relicks of the last ship-wrack, failed with two hundred and fifty ships to the mouth of the River Himers, and took by treachery the Town of Cephaladium, fome Diodorus eighteen miles distant upon the same shore: From Drepanns (for thither they had steared Guiverina Sicitheir course) they departed without effecting their purpose, being not able to take it on the sudden, and Carthals having fent thither supplies in case of a siege. Being not thereby discouraged from farther attempts, they happily accomplished another design of greater moment. They Polybius directed their course to Panormus, the principal City of the Carthaginians jurisdiction, and possessing the Haven, sate down under the very Walls, and the Panormitans refusing to yield, they encompassed the City with a Ditch and Bulwark. The nature of the ground savour'd their intendments, vielding plenty of materials and wood for their works, which being finished, they began the affault, and battered down with their Engines a Tower by the fea fide, and the fouldiers entring by the breach, with great flaughter of the enemy, took the outward City, which was called New Panormus; the old City did not long hold out, for a great number flying this Zonaras ther out of the new City bringing along with them more terror then provisions, they were dejected with confideration of their present danger, and fearing sudden scarcity, sent messengers to the Confuls with proposals to yield up all but their bodies; the Confuls knowing the wants of the belieged, accepted not the conditions unless they would redeem themselves at a certain price. Every head was valued at two Mine, fourteen thousand persons were ransomed, the rest, being thirteen thouland were fold together with the plunder. This Victory was very glorious of great and sudden concernment, for hereupon many Towns on that coast, some also far distant, cast out the Carthaginian Garrifons and submitted themselves to the Romans. The Jetines began, and Politics their example was followed by the Soluntines, Petrines, Tyndaritans and others. Affairs being thus transacted and a Garrison left at Panormus, the Conful returned to Messana and so to Rome, The Carthaginians lying in wait for them at their return, furprised some thips of Burthen with Zonarus

At Rome there was two Naval Triumphs made immediately one after another, by the former Marmora Cayear Consuls (whose command was prorogued) over the Cossurans and Carthaginians . Serv. pitolina. Fulvius triumphed the thirteenth of the Calends of February, and M. Aimilius the day after. The five hundreth year after the foundation of the City a fruitlesse expedition was made into Africa. Cn. Servilius Cn.F. (n.N Capio, and Cn. Sempronius Ti. F Ti. N. Blasus being Confuls, croffed over into Sicily, where having in vain attempted Lilybaum, they di- Polybius rected their course to Africk with two hundred and threescore ships, and failing along the coast Zonarus and fometimes landing, they took many Towns and got great plunder. They effected nothing Orefins. 4, 2. of greater moment, being hindred of entring into the most convenient Towns by the Carthaginians who every where met them with very good courage, having recovered whatfoever M. Regulas had possessed, and punished the revolters. For Hamiltar having ranged through Numidia and Mauricania, had reduced and quieted all that Tract, imposing a fine of a thousand Orofies. Talents of filver, and twenty thousand Oxen, and punishing the prime men who were thought to favour the Romans, three thouland whereof were Crucified. But the enemies encounter was not fo formidable to the Romans as their own ignorance in the places, and their dangers in Fulvium urfithe fea for failing to Mening, an lland of the Lolophagi, near unto the leffer Syrie, they num ftruck upon shallow places, the Tide going out, and were detained till the ships being emptied of Polybins their burthens, were by the Tide coming in again relieved from extreme danger. Having therefore escaped so great a distresse, and searing those dangerous places, without delay they failed selinus c. 30 away as if they fled, not that no leffe a calamity attended them then what they had avoided. To Panormus indeed they returned very fafe; but in their Voyage to Italy, as they failed about the Promontory of Palinurus, which reacheth out into the sea from the Lucanian Mountains a terrible from arifing fank above threefcore great ships, together with many horse-boats and Diederus veffels of Burthen. The City being exceedingly grieved at fuch frequent loffes, as if the very winds and water denyed the Romans the Soveraignty of the sea, the Senate decreed that their Zonaras Navy should conflit but of threescore ships, for the guard of Italy and transportation of provifions to their Army in Sieily. Nevertheleffe this misfortune hindred not one of the Confuls Fafti Capital; C. Sempronius from his Triumph over the Carthaginians on the Calends of April, ten dayes after Cn. Cornelius Proconful had made the like Triumph. There were Cenfors that year created at Rome, but L. Posthumius L. F. L.N. Megellus (who was likewise then Preter) dying in his Office, the other Cenfor D. Junius D. F. D. N. Pera did also lay down his Office.

The next Summer C. Aurelius L.F. C.N. Corta, and P. Servilius C. F. Cn. N. Geminus being Confuls, croffed over into Sicily, and amongst other Towns took Himera (upon the River Himera) but void of Inhabitants, whom in the night time the Carthaginians had carryed away. Yet it was a great advantage to have the possession of so considerable a place, and hereby the Romans wiped away that difference they had heretofore received at this City, for they had failed of their expectation of taking this City (named likewife Therma) by the covetouinels of their fouldiers. [For a certain Captive within the City, to whom was committed the cultody of one of the Gates, that he might thereby recover his liberty, did upon an appointed night Diodorus give admittance to the Roman Souldiers, who were fent to take possession of the City. When the chief of them were entred, they defiring to ingross the richest spoils unto themselves, gave order, To have the Gates fout again and no more men to be let (in. Aurelius the Confull thinketh of besieging Lipara, which had been so often in vain attempted. And in order thereunto gathereth together the choicest souldiers they had in all Sicelly, and borrowing thips of Hiero transporteth them into the Liparean Iland. From whence having occasion to return to Messana, to consult the Entrailes of Sacrifices, he deputed his Lieutenant in the fiege his Kinfman P. Aureolus Pecuniola (fome fay 2. adoe to defend his Camp. But upon the return of Aurelius, Fortune wheeling about, there V.l. Maximus was a very great flaughter made at the taking of the City, after which he proceeded to the punishment of the Colonell, whom he commanded to be beaten with stripes, and take pay among the common fouldiers; a very remarkable feverity, whereof he made fome other proofes in the time of his Confullship. When Lipara was taken, an Immunity was granted to the Posterity of 'Ολυμσ. Timalithens (once Governour of these places) that they should for ever be free from all Taxes ἀναγρ. For fince the misfortune of M. Regulus, the Romans stood so much in sear of the Elephants that they alwayes avoided Battell. Oftentimes within the Territories of Lilybaum, and often in the Selinuntian fields, they have flood in Battell-array about halfe a mile from the Enemy, vet durst neither venture according to their wonted Courage, to begin the Charge, or descend into plain and open ground, but still kept themselves in craggy and difficult places. The Carthaginians hereupon erecting their Spirits, (feeing they now had Confidence in their land Army and knew the Romans had had greater loffes by tempels at Sea, then themselves by unluckie fights, especially having intelligence of the Senates Resolution to set out no more Navies; conceived hopes of recovering Sicily, if they did but fend good store of land and sea-forces thither, pass by the Complaint of C. Aurelius the Confull, who informed the Censours, That in Sicily, to keep back their Pay. And truely as simes then went, the confideration of his feverity and strictness of Discipline, as well as his exploits performed, was occasion of his Triumph made over the Carthaginians and Sicilians upon the Ides of April. The next year was fuller of Threats, then action: For great preparations being made on both fides, and each standing in fome fear of the other, the whole fummer paffed away without any confiderable thing done. L. Cacilins L. F. C. N. Metellus, and C. Furius C. F. C. N. Pacilus, being Confulls, transporting their Logions over into Sicily, neither themselves much provoked the Enemy, or were provoked by them, though Afdruball a new Carthaginian Generall was lately come this ther with two hundred thips, an hundred and forty Elephants, and twenty thousand Horse and Foot. This business caused the Senate to enter into Consultation of preparing another Navy; for the Publick Treasures began to be exhausted by protracting the Warre, and fince the Missortune of M. Regulus, the Legions degenerated from their wonted Valour, and though all things should succeed prosperously at Land, yet 'twas manifest, the Carthaginians could not be kept off Sicily, folong as they had the fovereignty of the Seas. Refuming therefore their former resolutions, they began to put confidence again in their ships, and with all care to trimme the old, and build new ones. In the mean time L. Mesellus being left at Panormus, C. Furius returned to Rome, to the chusing of the new Confuls, who were C. Atilins M. F. M. N. Regulus, and L. Manlins A.F. P.N. Unlfo, to these was committed the charge of preparing the Navy and men for the ships , L. Metellus was continued in his Command, with Commission to manage Folyb. 1.39 Afdruball understanding that one of the Romans Generals was ablent with half their forces, and computing with himself, that though the Armies had long stood in Battel aray one against the other, the Romans had out of fear declined fight, being now no longer able to bear the complaints of his own fouldiers who accused him of cowardize, he drew all his forces out of Diedoras Litybaum, and after a long and difficult march through the Selinuncian Territories, he invaded thole of Pansrmus and there pitched his Camp. It fortun'd, that the Proconful, with the remainder of the Roman strength was then at Panormus to guard their Associates, now harvest grew on, in reaping and carrying in their grain. He, having inteligence that some of the enemies spies lay secretly at Panormus, commanded every man in the City to meet together in an Zonaras Affembly, then giving order they should examine one another, and question those who were leaft known, What they were, or what business they had at Panormus, found out the spies and feized on them. By them he understood the enemies defigns, and observing there was more rafiness then good counsel in their expedition, pretended great fear, and kept himself within the works of the City, that so he might encrease their soolish considence. Whereupon Assuraball growing bolder, advanced his forces, spoiling and burning all the corn in the fields, and marching up even to the walls of the City. The Proconful regarded neither the loss fulfained nor the digrace thence redounding, foreseeing that if he did a little longer forbear, the Carthaginians would fufficiently facisfie him for both with good Ufe. Above all, he thought good to expect till they croffed the River Orethus, which runneth on the South fide of the Town, and then he Flagellus de had contrived a fure and fudden Victory. To effect this, as all other things were ordered to fig - rebus Siculis. nifie his fear, fo he placed but few fouldiers upon the walls, defiring that the enemy should not Fronting understand either the courage or number of his men. This counsel succeeded according to his Strat.3.17 expectation, both the enemy by his confidence, and fortune by a fudden chance furthering the defign: For Afarmball Forded the River with his Foot, Horse and Elephants, and planted his Camp close under the walls of the City, with so much contempt of the enemies Cowardize, that he pitched his Tents without any works of defence about them, thinking there was no need of Diddorm Thither the Sutlers and Merchants bringing great plenty of Corne and Wine, the Mercenaries drank floutly, and elevating their voices according to their several dialects, in much noise and confusion gave good notice of their present temper, that they were not very sober. Then Polybian did the Proconful think the fittest time to fend those his mea who were ready armed to provoke the enemy to fight, and it succeeded so happily, that fill sending out by degrees fresh supplies, Astrobal's whole Army at length came out of the Camp, L. Casissus the Proconsal placeth part of the light armed men before the Trench, giving order, If the Elephants approached to fling their darts at them, and if they found themselves fore pressed to retire into the Trench, and thence come out again to a fresh charge. The mean Artificers and common rout he commanded to carry darts and weapons, and fling them over the wall that the light armed men should not want plenty of them. Himself with his companies completely armed, stood in Rank and File within the gate over against the enemies right Wing. They who were already engaged sometimes being overpower'd in number retreated in good order, sometimes being affilited by supplies from the Town did maintain the sight. When the Rectors of the Elephants desiring in emulation to feem Authors of the Victory as well as Afdrubal, and advancing with their beatls, beat back those who opposed them, and rashly pressing upon them (as they retired toward the City) came up even to the Trench. But then a shower of Arrows slying from the walls, and fresh light armed men assaulting them with Spears and Darts, the Elephants being wounded began to rage, and betaking themselves which way soever anger and pain led them, turned upon their own men, trampled under foot, routed and diforder'd whole companies of arm-

Whereupon the Proconful crying, This is the time of the long look's for Victory, iffueth out, and being fresh and in good rank had an easie victory over the confused multitude of the enemy; there was a great flaughter made both in the field and in the purfuit, their calamity Poblis being excreased by a sudden chance which one would have thought of advantage to them : For Diedorus about the same time the Carthaginian Navy appearing at shore, the whole multitude trembling Zonarue and blind with fear, promicuoully ran thither as to the only refuge, in which harly burly maay were trodden under feet by the Elephants; many venturing to swim, and many too hastily scaling the ships and tumbling down perished in the sea. Neither before this time nor after it amongst all their prosperous exploits, had the Romans any Victory more glosious; whereby the Romans refumed their former confidence and courage, and the enemy was so disheartened with fear, that they cast off net only all hopes but all thoughts of a land Army so long as that Oresius 3.9

walls on each fide in the form of stables, the Elephants otherwise very fearful of failing by water. Aldruball from this overthrow escaped to Lilybaum, but being condemned at Carthage while he was absent, and afterward upon his return apprehended, he was accordingly executed. The Carthaginians now confidering their Armies were routed, their Elephants taken, all Sicily lok except Lilybaum and Drepanus, that the Romans having again fet out a Navy, were very potent both at land and fea, began to think of Peace, willing to accept of it on any tolerable conditions. Whereupon they remembred M. Regulus and the conditions he once propounded to them. and perswaded themselves that by his means they might prevail either for peace or at least for what they next defired, an exchange of prisoners; nothing doubting but that for his own sake he would effectually interpose himself in such a busines: For what man can be imagined so obstinate as not to free himself from the miseries of a Gaole, and desire to see bis dearest relations, and enjoy his Liberty, Country, Dignities and Honours? M. Regulus hath a wife and children at Rome friends and kindred in the Senate and publick offices, a Coufin German now Conful, he is both much beloved by the Senate and people of Rome for his former victories, and pitied for his afflictions; if therefore he beareth any good will to himself, or findeth any respect from his friends, no man certainly will be more earnest in prosecuting, or is more likely by favour to effect such a design. He accepted the employment, not out of any hope or defire to do himself good, as afterward appeared, but that he might in person the more effectually move the Senate to have a care of the Commonwealth. So being joyned with the Carthaginian Embassadors, when he was come to the City, he would not enter the Gates though much entreated by the Romans, alledging. The Custome of his Country to give Audience to the Embassadors of an enemy without the City. The

The Embassadors presently withdrawing he likewise accompanied them in either, though he was earnestly solicited; would he be present in the Senate at the debate of the business till the Carthaginians assented to it. Then fitting filent till his opinion was required, he thus expressed himself, "Conferior Fathers," 'I am fill a Roman: my Body indeed, as Fortune would have it is in the power of the ene-mies, but my Soul, not subject to Fortune, is fill the lame. Following therefore the reason of my Sonl, which is my own, rather then the inclinations of my Body, which is anothers, my 'advice is, You would neither exchange prisoners' nor conclude a peace. For to restore the Captives, while the war continueth is disadvantageous: They have no Commanders in hold but my felf who am an eld man, you have many, and those young, amongst which are some no way to be despited. And to finish the war, unless upon very ample terms, or without a complete universal Victory, as it becometh not your Wildom, so it is pernicious to the Commonwealth. I know you meet with many difficulties in managing the war, for no great affairs f can be transacted without great pains and cost: But if you rightly consider the state of Car-'thage, you will find all things tending to victory to be much the better on your part. We "were indeed once overcome in a great Battel whether it were my fault or fortunes; but we have ' so often routed their Armies, that the confidence they had assumed upon my overthrow is now, by the Victory at Panormus, preffed down to the utmost despair. They have lost all Sicily, except one or two Cities, and in the other Hands their condition is naught. You have a Navy which they dare not encounter, so that in that part of the war ye are also superiours. And the losses we have sustained by Tempest hath not bereaved you of so much strength as it hath taught you Circumspection. The want of money perhaps is equal on both sides; but the Ita-I lians are more obedient to you then are the Africans to the Carthaginians, whom as they neever truly loved, so have they of late learn't to hate more perfectly. For not being provoked by any fuch injury they revolted freely to me, but now fince their former mafters have wasted their Grounds plundred their Cattel exacted their Monies and flain their Nobles, what do ' you think they can more defire, then that a new Army would come from hence into Africa? But that your leavyes of men are easie and large, that your souldiers are valiant, of the same Language, the same Mind, the same Manners, Religion, City and Kindred, I take to be so great an advantage, that if in all things else ye were exceeded, this one only thing would be sufficient to balance the war, and make the Victory doubtful on the enemies fide, for what help is there in a company of Mercinaries against fuch a force? and if there were any, the Carthaginians have bereaved themselves of it by their cruelty, and they have made it now as difficult to hire strangers, as it was before to govern them. Xanthippus to whom Carthage is indebted for its preservation, having been so ingratefully and treacherously used, is sufficient warning to others how they lend their affiftance to fuch a people who know not how to recompence the greatest desert but by the greatest injuries. Nay, the very common and meanest Barbarians, a Brutish and slavish fort of men, will be deterred by Cruesties so often exercised upon their Fellowes, who have been fometimes murthered by hangmen, or their fellow Souldiers, fometimes exposed into barren and uninhabited Hands, receiving inflead of the pay they have fought for, most inhumane punishments, and horrible deaths. And this Conscript Fathers is my Opinion, that neither Peace is to be made with Carthage, nor yet an exchange

This Counfell displeased not the Senate, if it could have been executed with the safety of him who gave it; but the more he neglected himselse for the Common good, the more they pitted him, and manifeltly inclined upon any termes whatfoever to reftore fo Gallant and Generous a Person to his Country. And voices were given out, that seeing he was now so happily returna retinit of the state of the s High Priest likewise affirmed, that he might stay, without incurring the guilt of Perjury. But troping, he to the Amazement of the Senate it felfe, with a fierce Spirit, and fevere Countenance, proceeded, faying, why do ye not refetve this doubt? follow my Advice and regard not me. Ye in vain attempt that which will be neither pleafing to your felves, nor profitable to the Country, nor honeft in me. For suppose, for a while ye would be willing and joyfull to see me amongst 'you, when once the short spurt of this affection is vanished, the Baleness of my Return will make me more odious to you, then my absence made me desirable. For my part I am resolved Eutropius b.6 not to live in that City, where after an African flavery, I cannot maintain the dignity of an 6 koneft Citizen, and if I should defire it, my fidelity would hinder it, the remembrance of my Silius b.2 facred Oath would hinder it, and my Reverence of the Gods, by the Invocation of whom I 'affured the Carthaginians of my return. And should I forswear my selfe, I fear that Revenge would be taken not only on me, but on your felves, and the whole Roman People also. The Gods, believe me, are no vain things, and will not without Punishment be affronted by the Perjuries and Contempts of Man. If any one be of opinion that in Religion I may be absol-'ved, that the bookes of the Angurs mention expiations of fuch crimes, and that Attoneoment may be made by Ceremonies and Sacrifices for Perjury, and Treason; I would have him understand the Majesty of the Gods is more severe, then being offended by Perjury, to be appeafed by any Inventions of Men, neither is it agreeable to Reason, that a Guilt contracted by the fins of man, should be washed away with the blood of Beasts. As for my selfe, I am not e ignorant that great and exquisite torments are prepared for me at Carthage. But to deceive a truft, I think to be worse then all of them, for this would indeed hutt me, as for the Torments they hurt only something about me. Think not that man miserable who is able to endure milery. Slavery, Reproach, Contempt, Griefe, Hunger and Watching, I never yet effective ed evill, but now by a long custom they have left off to be troublesom to me. That they are tollerable, I have learn't by fuffering them; and if once they be intended to that degree, as not to be born by Man, Death will quickly free me not only from them, but from all other Calamities. Nothing therefore is to be feared for him who feareth not Death, which is easie at any time to obtain, and truely I had inflicted it on my felfe, but that I thought it the part of a man rather to overcome forrow then to avoid it. I have fooken these few and confused words. that ye may understand, I am not to be perswaded from my Opinion, and withall that you 'should not bewaile me as an unfortunate and miserable Man: My Resolution is easy and con-

'Tis reported that the more effectually to move them he affirmed, shat before he was difmiffed from Carthage, they had given him agentle Poifon , which by flow degrees feeding on his vi- Tuditanua tall spirits, Sould consume him after the exchange Was made. Wonderfull was the constancy and Agelliof this Man, who, rather then swerve from the Rule of Honesty, did with more earnestness purfue Contumelies, Torments and Death, then others avoid them, a true and profitable Leffon to Pofferity, That those men only are prepared to endure any Torments, and are constant in their honest resolutions, who have a sense of their own nobility, and think themselves borne not onely for this world. For certainly M. Regulus would not willingly have undergone fo great mileries; if he had not thought that after Death there are great Rewards for the Virtuous, and great Silimb.6

with great honesty and Honour: He was a man of great Integrity of Manners, of an Invincia ble Spirit and for his Counfell not to be despised, wherein neither his own nor after ages could accuse him, but that he seemed not very moderately to bear his prosperous Fortune, and that by denying the Carthaginians request he was the occasion of the wars continuance for many years after to the great detriment of both Cities. But he wiped off this his fault by his other many egregious virtues, and chiefly by his wonderful constancy at his death, being more happy in fuffering calamitie then if he could have avoided it. The Senate hearing the news of his death and the Barbarous cruelty of the Carthaginians, delivered up the Noblest of the Captives to Marsia and her children whom they that up in an Engine thrust through with share irons refolying to put them to the like death as Regulus had fuffered; for five whole daies they had no food allowed them! in which Boffar with grief and hunger pined to death : Hamilear being ftronger in body continued five dayes longer, thut together with the carcaffe of B. flar, with fuftenance fufficient only to prolong his miserable life, Till at length the Magistrates understanding what was in doing, did restrain their cruelty, commanding that the Ashes of Boffar should be conveighed into his own Country, and that the other prisoners should be handled with more mercy. Whereby appears a remarkable difference of manners in the two Cities, in that the one being not unjuftly offended, nor able with fecurity to offend, with horrid punishments extinguished that virtue they ought to have reverenced; the other mitigated a most just revenge nor regarding their own enraged grief, but the Rules of Humanity, and that moderation which becometh Illustrious Empires.

PON the departure of the Carthaginian Embassadors the Consuls having Order from the Senate to transport their Army into Sicily, did very readily obey, being highly incenfed against the enemy for M. Regulus his fake, and likewise provoked with emulation and conceiving great hopes from the Victory of L. Metellus Proconful. For they measured not the greatnesse of the businesse so much by the losse of the Carthaginians, who were much weakened by the loffe of an Army and so many Elephants, but chiefly they were encouraged because the fouldiers, having successefully fought against the beasts, did now no more stand in fear of them. And hopes were conceived the war might suddenly be finished if opportunities were not neglected. The Confuls therefore with a Navy of two hundred thips, and four Legions failed to Panormus, where taking in likewise the other forces and ships (unless what were left for the guard and fecurity of some places) they went to Lilybaum with 240 Beak-Etymologica in ed ships, threescore Barks of a shorter fize, called Cercurs, and many other vessels of all forts, with resolution to make an assault upon it. This is that samous si ege of Lilybaum, which beginning the fourteenth year of this war, lasted full ten years, and at length was ended, neither with the furprise of the City, nor with its furrendry, but together with the whole War. For both the Romans and Carthaginians well understanding of what concernment that City was, either to the Guard of the African Coast, or the Empire of Sicily, did with all their might, the Virius Flaceus affirmes they were all flain, the Romans not caring to make use of them themselves, and thinking it no way for the advantage of the Common-wealth, to make a Present of so considerable a strength to any Prince. The same M. For there was greater flore of these Commodities then of money, which by the long continuance of warre grew very scarce. While these things hapned at Rome, the Consulls in Sicily affaulted Lilybaum with all their strength, and the belieged as stoutly resisted. The first attempt was against a Tower, which stood farthest toward the Libyan fea, this being demolished, they did 201/bins 1.42. by degrees proceed to those which were next, till they had destroyed fix. For the more easy battering of the rest they began to fill up the Trenches, that they might draw over and plant their Zonaras Engines. Though the labour were very great for the ditch was three core cubits broad, and Diodorus 24. forty deep) they did readily fet upon and diligently promote the work. The Carthaginians to 20mars. hinder their delign, made holes on the infide of the Trench, out of which they cast the rubbidge Diodorus again, but, the heapes still encreasing, and the ditch at length made even with the ground, (by reason of the multitude of Labourers) they changed their Counsell, and crected another wall within the former: Himileo being at all Workes indefacigable, who belides the multitude of Inhabitants in the City, had ten thousand Mercenaries, and did by his wisdom, Vigilance Polybius. and constancy clude and overcome all the Enemies force and Stratagems. He suffered nothing to be out of order among his own men , nor any thing to be secure on the Enemies part; he built Work against Work, digged Mine against Mine, opposed Armes to Armes, sometimes he issued forth, sighting with such resolution, that in these tumultuary skirmishes there were sometimes flain little fewer, then ufually fall in fet Battells.

The Romans undermineing the Foundation of the Walls, Himilto made his countermine over against the place where he observed the Romans to cast out earth, and opening their Mine he fent in forthwith a Band of Armed fouldiere, who fat upon the naked Romans buffe at work, and flew a great number; and as many were burnt with brush faggots (thrown into the Trench and Tobbias, 1, 43 set onfire) while they approached the Walls to helpe their fellowes. Notwithstanding feare and confirmation of mind encreased among the belieged, whereby some Mercenary Commanders taking advantage, and pretending want of pay, plotted to betray the City to the Romans, no-bible doubting but that they could eafily induce every man his fouldiers to approve of the defign. On a certain night therefore flipping out of the Town into the Roman Camp, they declared the flate of the City, and what they had intended; Amongst the other Mercenaries at Lilybaum. there was one Alexon an Achaian, a Man not unskilfull in Martiall Affaires, and of lingular Integrity: He understanding the Traytors design, without delay discovers it to Himileo, Himileo as in a great and imminent danger, immediately fummons together all the Mercenary Commanders, who were yet in the Town, declares to them what was in agitation, and by whom, and vehemently inveighing against them, he exhorteth those who are present, not to become partners in the rashness and Treachery of others, that persisting in their Duty, they should find all fair dealing from the Caribacinians, their Pay Bould be certain, and green Rewards moreover accumulated, that if they tainted themselves with the infamous crime of Treason, they would be hatefull to God and man; withall, as much money as in halt and fear he could at prefent raife. he distributes among them, promiting that, himfelfe would take care to fee the Common fouldiers pay acone as may be discharged.

An Oration made in season, hath certainly great power over the Minds of men, especially if the gravity of the speaker be mixed with truth and sincerity to be relied upon; Every one asfented to what Himiles spake, and chearfully offered their utmost endeavours to continue their Politic fouldiers in their Duty. Himiles commending them, and furthermore encouraging them with hopes, commands every one to apply bimselfe to his own Companys, and endeavour to keep them in Subjection: He sendeth likewise along with them Hanniball, the son of Hanniball, who je tished in Sardinia, and Alexon the Achaian , Hanniball to the Gaules, with whom he was acquainted, and very gratious, by Reason of his sormer conversation with them in the Wars; Alexon to other Marcenaries of feverall Nations, by all whom he was equally beloved. These engaging their Words, that what sever Himilco had promised should be performed, so effectually made up the business, that the Traitors a while after returning to the Walls, were not onely kept out, but beaten back with darts, and reproached for their Villany. So they returning to the Consults without effecting their Design, were nevertheless rewarded with Gifts, and had Land in Sicily bestowed on them.

her ball likewise much perplexed them at sea, suddenly falling sometime on the Sicilian, sometime on the Itulian shore, leaving nothing unattempted whereby he might mischief the Romans.

Hence it came to pasthat there was great scarcity in the Roman Camp, for they had almost no food left but onely the flesh of beasts, many died of Famine, and many more, as is usuall in

ded that one of the Confulls with his Legions should return to Rome to the Assembly of the People, that the other Besiegers might have the greater Plenty. After thin the

Romans again with greater pains and deligence endeavoured with earth and stones to stop up

ry on affaires with much Vigour; therefore they commanded Adberbal the Admiral to provide a Navy and convey Men , Money, and Corne to Libybann. By him was fent Hannibal the fon of Hamiltan, who having a frell gale of wind, from the Egulan Ilands, failed directly into the port of Lilybaum; his men ready armed for fight, and refolving to break through all opposition. The Romans had from the beginning of the flege flopped up the mouth of the haven by finking fifteen thips, which they had for that purpose laden with stones, being therefore suddenly overtaken with the Enemies haft, and fearing left themselves might by the force of the winds be driven into the Port, a place made unfafe for Navigation, they did not at all oppose the Enemie. Hannibal fafely entred the Harbour, and landing his men to the number of tenthouland, was received into the City with very great joy of the Lilybetans. The Romans feeing they could not prevent the Enemies Arrival, entred into Confultation how to defend their Works, which they thought Himilico would not delay to fet upon, having fo great a recruit of fresh fouldiers; neither were they deceived, for Himileo intending to make use both of his new strenght and of the Courage of the others now revived, fummons all his forces together, and by hopes of Victory and ample rewards perswades them to make a fallie, and haveing disposed his Companies as the Occasion required, by break of day he assaulteth the Romans works in many places. The fight therefore being very hot in every place, the fharpest Contention was about the Engines, fonde striveing to spoile them, other to defend them, with fo great Vehenience that they spared their own lives no more then their Enemies. A great number of flaine men lay in that flation where the Affault first began, the Clamour and noise of the Warriours, and Terrose of the Battel were much encreased by another Company, which brake out, with links and forches, rufhing, through all dangers and Deaths, to fet fire on the Engines; and the Roman foulders were near giving place to the fierceneffe of the Enemic, as no longer able to defend their Enginess But Himsles feeing many of his men perifh, and the Romans as yet nothing to remit of their Courage in refiftin g, founded a Retreat, and went first

But the very fame of the Work did for a time keep the Haven block tup, which very much troubled the Carthaginians: that they could now by no means hold intelligence with their friends, neither durit any man undertake to visit the Lilybætans and give an account of their Condition, till at length one Hannibal firnamed Rhodins ingaged himself to enter the City, and having viewed all things, to returne with a faithfull Account. The promise pleased the Carthaginians: but they had little faith in it; because they knew beside the heapes of rubbifh, that the Haven was watched and warded by the Roman ships at Anchor there: But he having rigged a private ship he had, failed to one of the llands over against Litybeam, and the next day having a favourable wind, at ten of the clock in the day time, openly in the face of the enemy wondring at his confidence entred the Haven. But the Conful to intercept him in his return in the night time placed ten choice thips on each fide the Haven, five as near the mouth as might be. Hannibal trusting in the swiftness of his Vessel came out in the day time; the Romans were ready in the expectation of him, and with all their endeavours fet forward against him but he was so much too quick for them, that not contenting to escape he moreover infulted over them, sometimes failing, sometimes wheeling about as if he would challenge them to fight. When he had often used this bold exploit, it proved of great advantage to the Carthaginian affairs, in that the Belieged were infinitely comforted with meffages from their friends, in that at Carthage they daily understood the state and progresse of things at Lilybeum as occasion required, and in that the Romans were so much ashamed and madded at the rashneffe of the men which they could not revenge. He was much helped in his defign by his knowledge of the Channel and the passages thereabouts; for between those Fenny and moorish places whereby is the passage to Lilybann, he diligently observed a very safe and sure course for his ship. For when he came from the main Sea within fight of the City, he so turned his ship. that the Stern of it was toward Italy, and from the Foredeck the Tower of Lilybaum which was upon the shore, hindred the fight of all other Towers toward Africa, and this is the only

And now many more being encouraged by the boldness and success of Hanniball, began to correspond with Lilybaum, till at length by a certain chance a vessel of great swiftness was taken. For though in other places the Romans Dams were carried away by the winds and water, yet in one place, where the Sea was somewhat shallow, they stood firm; there the ship striking and being detained was taken by the Romans, and being furnished with stout souldiers and good rowers proved the ruine of Hannibal alfo. For having entred the City in the night time and returning in the open day, he spied this ship every where waiting upon his motion, whereupon apprehending danger, at first he fled, but that being in vain, he made some opposition and was fafe way of entring the Harbour with full fail.

The Romans being possessed of this ship, and observing the same course of entring the Haven, did afterward eafily hinder any other veffels from failing to Lilybaum. The Befiegers Dioderns :4, $ began now very fiercely to intend their main business, and affaulting one of the Works near the Sea. drew the whole company of the belieged to defend that fide where the ftorm was made, whereby opportunity was given to other forces who were referved for that purpose to make an affault upon the contrary part and take the outward wall: but this proved in vain, for the Carthagmian General featonably coming with a supply of choice men, beat the Romans out with great flanghter. Another greate for the new part of the universal Victory; there arose by chance very great gusts of wind, which as it were on set purpose blew hard upon the Romans works, shaking their very Rampires, and tumbling down the Towers built thereon. The townsmen were not ignorant of this, and thought now an opportunity given them by the gods of firing the Romans Engins, which they had so often in vain affaulted. The substance of the Engins was very apt to take fire, having been long felled and dried with the heat of the Sun, The Romans were not flack in defending themselves, but not to much purpose, for the enemy was directed by the light of the fire which had feized on the Engines, and affifted with the ftrength of the wind to cast their darts more surely and with greater force, the others received no less hinderance and danger thereby, then by the weapons of the enemies, for the wind being fierce and against the Romans blew smoke, and flame, and ashes into their mouths and eyes, and brought the enemies darts with greater violence upon them, whereas themselves by reason of darknesse were uncertain whither to direct their strokes, and by reason of the vehemency of the gusts were not well able to fland. So that all the Roman Engines and works either for digging of mines or Windows battering the walls were every one confumed by this fire.

Then was all hopes laid afide of taking Lilybaum by force, and the fiege had been prefently Polybius raifed but that Hiero . fending plenty of Corn and provision, perswaded the Romans to stay : Diodorus, where not intending to make any more froms upon the City, they did on every lide fence their Polybims Camp, refolving to commit the iffue of things to Time and Fortune. The Belieged likewife building up what part of their walls had been battered, were now the more encouraged to endure the fiege hereafter. These news were very fadly entertained at Rome, nevertheless they determined by war to make up what loffes by war they had fuftained: and their refolution herein was fo immoveable, that, 'tis faid, a Senator was flain in the very Court because he made mention of Peace. Great preparations were now made, and a new leavy of ten thouland Rowers fent into Si. Zonsras. cily, for they had fultained a great loffe of them. The Confuls were P. Clodins Ap.F.C.N. Pulcher, and L. Junius C.F. C.N. Pullus. Tis fallely by some delivered, that this Clodins was Plinie 15,1 the fon of Cacus. He, when he was come into Sicily and had taken possession of the Army at apud Hales. Lilybaum, affembled the Souldiers together, and sharply reprehended the former Confuls. That by their idleness and luxury they had trifled away time before Lilybæum more like men besieged then besiegers, without any fruit, and to the loss and disbonour of the Roman Majesty. He was a very crabbed fowr man, and being Violent by Nature, and Arrogant by reason of his Nobility, he was apt to let fall Speeches and perform Actions not well becoming a ferious fober man.

He was very severe in punishing, letting passe no crime with pardon, but prosecuting even the

He perswaded himself and his souldiers, that the enemy not having intelligence of what supplies were come from Rome, might be unawares surprised at Drepanus. not believing that the Romans had either courage or strength sufficient to provoke them at sea. So that making choice of two hundred and twenty of the best ships with the stoutest Rowers. and most valiant men out of the Legions (for they offered themselves freely as to a short businesse and certain prey, Drepanus being not above fifteen miles from Lilybaum) he privately set fail about the third Watch, and had in the night time a prosperous Voyage, not being seen by the enemy. But at day break the ships being discovered not far from Drepanus, gave an Alarm to Adherball, because such a fight was there unusual, insomuch as no doubt was made but that it was the enemy who approached; the Carthaginians were forced either prefently to encounter and enter fight, or to luffer themselves to be surrounded and besieged by the enemy; this latter they resolved against, because as it would have involved them in much trouble and danger fo it would have been imputed as a crime upon their miscarriage. Adherball therefore on a sudden called together his Sea-men, and by a Cryer fummoning the Mercenaries to an Affembly in a short but very pithy speech admonished them what hopes there were of victory if they would readily and chearfully take Arms, and what danger of a fiege was imminent if they declined battel. When every man with one confent had agreed to follow his counsel, Adherball commending their obedience, forthwith gives order that they should take ship, and observing what course the Admiral Recred (wherein himself failed) to follow it. Whereupon he before the rest faileth toward the main sea, going out of the Haven just under the Rocks hanging over it at the same time when the Roman ships entred on the other side. P. Cloding finding the enemy no whit difmayed, or declining fight, as he had hoped, but floutly prepared to defend themfelves, was much troubled, and retreated back with his ships to encounter the enemy in the open feas. But his were in no good order, but as chanceably they had outfailed one another, fome were entred the Haven, others were making toward it, and some were just in the mouth of it: Whereupon it came to passe, that while they all endeavour'd to make a sudden return, they dashed one against another, and struck their Oars together, till being got out of the Haven as well as they could, because they wanted time, they ranged themselves in Battel-array just under the fhore. The Conful, who had failed in the Rere before. now changing his seation, came before all and placed injurier in the left Wing; but the Carthaginians failing by the enemies left Wing with five Beaked ships, tacked about facing the Romans, and had the open sea on his back, other ships as they came he commanded to place themselves at a convenient distance, and when all were order'd according to his mind he fetteth forward against the enemy. And now fign of Battel being given from both the Admirals they fiercely encounter on all sides, at first with equal Disdows 14, 1 hopes, but afterward to the Carthaginians better fortune. For though they had the leffer Polybias 1.51. number of fhips, to wit, but ninety armed; in other respects they did exceed, for their ships were better and their water-men more skilful; they had likewife made choice of a most convenient place of fight, for as often as they were hard put to it they had free egreffe into the open fea, where they could eafily by their fwiftness avoid the enemy, or if he long pursued them, return and encompasse him. But the Romans being so near the shore had not the like convenience, they could neither fail into the main nor with fafety well retire, but as often as the enemy preffed upon them, they either fluck in the fands or endanger'd themselves upon the shore. Being therefore unable to break through the enemy by force and charge him in the Rere, by rea. fon of the flowness of their ships and unskilfulness of the Rowers, and being cooped up in a narrow place not able from the Stern to help their fellows who were in danger, they were beaten to the Carthaginians little lofs. To these difficulties was added another cause of despair from their Religion, and they thought would not feed. This occurrence made the fouldiers more flack and faint hearted, fighting, as they thought, with the ill will of the gods. But the author of all this calamity, when he had loft every thing elfe, he wanted neither wit nor boldness to preserve himself; for when he saw his ships in such numbers sank and taken, he slipt away between the shore and the enemy with thirty ships which stood next him. And that he might safely arrive to his Army at Lilybaum, being to fail by some of the Carthaginians Guards, he adorned his ships in token of Victory. The Carthaginians therefore imagining the Conful had been victorious, and that his other ships would fuddenly follow, fuffered him fafely to paffe by, being themselves much terrified and dejected. The enemy took all the ships the Consul left behind, even ninety and three, together with the Souldiers and Rowers, except only those who striking upon the shore, cast them-Polib. 1.51 felves on land and fled. But in the fight a great number were funk; for Clodius brought above two hundred from Lilybaum. This great victory cost the Carthaginians very little, for they lost

did not eat, he commanded them to be flung into the fea, that they might drink though they

Neither here did this yeares fortune make a stop, but afficted the Romans with another great calamity, whereby they loft not onely the prefent possession of the seas, but all hopes of regaining it. For the other Confull L. Junius coming out of Italy with many ships of burthen, laden with Corn for the Army, and fifty beaked thips arrived at Moffana, where he met mith a great Pohb.1.52 number of other Vessells, from the Army, and other parts of Sieily. Joyning himself with there, he made up a Navy of an hundred and twenty long thips, almost eight hundred ships of burthen, and faileth to Syracufe. Being arrived thither, he fendeth the Questions before with part of the Navy to Lilybaum; himselse remaineth at Syracuse, expecting those others from Melfans, who were not able to overtake him, and taking in grain which his Midland friends brought down to the sea side. In the mean time Adberball having sent the Roman ships and Captives to Carthage (Fortune and Glory putting him forward to action) delivered thirty Diedorns hips more to Carthalo, who had brought feventy, with as many thips of Burthen from Africa, Polybius. and fent him to drive out the Roman ships from the Haven of Litybeam, or to fire or fink them.

He at break of the day entring the Haven with great Terrour, fome thips he boorded, and others he fired; in the mean time Himileo Governour of the City, made a fally with the Mercenaries upon those Romans who went to defend the ships, which caused great fear in the Camp-In fine Curribate having destroyed not very many, carried away five, and directed his Course to Horacles. Lying there in wait to obstruct the Romans Voiage to Lilybanm, he heareth newes Diodorus of a considerable Navv of all kinds of shins failing by He therefore joyning other Commanders with himfelfe, made up a Navy of an hundred and twenty good ships, confiding in which strength, and animated by former success, he presently maketh out of the Haven to meet the Enemy. By the shore of Gelus the Navys came in fight Poblius, one of the other, but the Roman Quæstors searing a disadvantageous encounter, diverted their Pathin course to Phintiades, a Town in League with the Romans, at Phintiades there is no Haven Didage, onely the rocks running out into the fea afford a pretty fafe riding for ships. Here the Romans landing, prepared themselves for the Enemies coming, having brought Engines of offence out of the Town, and placed them on the shore for safeguard of the ships. The Carthaginians at first refolved to have belieged the Enemy, thinking that out of fear they would have fled into the Town, and have left their thips for a Pery. But when the Romans flood flourly to their own defence, and that they found the fight full of danger, likewife not much trufting in a place formewhat inconvenient for the ships they defisted; and having taken a few Vessells laden with Diedorne provision they failed to the River Halrens, not farre distant, there they healed their wounded Polyk. province they rate motion of the Enemy. Other Writers following, I believe, Philinus, af Dieser, that the Romans sufferned greater loss, that the Quafters being daunted at the first fight of the Enemy, in their flighe to Phintiades left behind their flips of burthen, and all other Veffells but men of Warre, that in the fight fifty round Veffells, and threefore long hips were funk, and thirteen so splitt and hatter'd that they were made unfit for service.

Not long after the Carthaginians fill abiding at the River Halyens , L. Junius the Confull, Popt. 1, 54. having done his business at Syracuse, failing toward Lilybaum, about the Promontory of Pachynus, was discovered by some of Carthalo his ships, who thereupon with all speed makes out to meet him (being ignorant of all passages at Phintiades) that he might fight him as farre from Quelfor's Navy as might be, left they should come in for his succour. The Confull seeing the Enemy make up toward him, not daring to fight, nor being able to avoid them, drives his thips into a rough and troublesome creeke, neer Camerina, a greater fear overcoming this lefter, lest his whole Army should fall into the Enemies Power. Carthalo not daring to venter into the fame place, takes up his station at a certain Promontory, from whence he might equally intend himselse against either Navy. A while after, when the Winds blew high , the Carthaginian shipmasters (skilfull in such Affaires) foreseeing a tempest, perswaded Carthalo to forsake that station, and steere to Pachynns, and so the Carthaginians, but not without great paines, avoided the force of the Tempest; But both the Roman Navys utterly perished upon the Orosiura. Rocks, infomuch that of the whole shipwrack there remained not a piece of board of any use, Palyb. excepting onely two ships, wherein the Consull with the small remainder of his men arrived Diolor. at Lilybeum. All the ships of provision were lost, and above an hundred long ships; but Europius 3. part of the Armie was faved, leaping into the sea and swimming to shore. The Senate, who Polyb. had lately called home P. Clodins the Confull, for his mifcarriage in Sicily, hearing also of Juwise his misfortune, gave over all confidence in the feas, refolving nevertheless with all their firength and Counsell to prosecute the Warre by land. They thought good to continue the fiege of Lilybaum; appointing certain men to take care of conveighing necessary accommodations in good feason, to the Army there. Though the Carthiganians were Masters at fea, yet they were incouraged, in that at land they were superiour, and that almost all Sicily was either under their power, or in League with them : But they were not pleased with their Confulls this year, neither did they think that things would succeed prosperously under the Confulls

the blot of his shipwracke, by some noble Exploit, watching all opportunities of Action, did at length find a way to take Eryx, by the Treachery of some within it, whom he had corrupted by gifts and promifes. Eryx is the highest Hill in Sicily except Atna, scituate between Panor-mus and Drepana, in that part of the Iland which lieth towards Italy, being more craggy toward Drepana. In the top thereof there is a Plaine whereon standeth the Temple of Venus celebrated this year, or fourteen yeares after, when P. Cornelius Lentulus, and C. Licinius Varus were Confulls. I think it more probable they were celebrated this year, the fear conceived from their late overthrows, and hope of better fortune, inviting them thereunto, if their Religion were diligently performed. This was a very fruitfull year, infomuch as twelve pound of oile was fold for an Affis; In the mean time the Dictatourship being expired, or Atilius ha-ginians of Lilybaum and Drepanum, that they could make no large Excursions, nor so often as they had done, and took their Garrisons which were remote from the sea. Carthalo having made many attempts against them in vain, resolved at length to waste the Italian Coasts, that thereby he might divert the Confulls from Sicily; or if they refused to come back to succour their Country, depopulate their grounds, and take Cities. But fortune did not herein favour his delignes. For the Pratour being fent out with the City-forces for defence of the Coun-

likewise set faile neglecting the Indication of the Birds. They fled therefore to a new and no usuall Refuge, and created a Dictatour to go into Sicily; whereas, before this time, never any one so impowered, had led an Army out of Italy. The Insolence of P. Clodius the Consult was then very notable, and almost incredible; For being commanded by the Senate to nominate a Dictatour, he named M. Clandins Glycias, who was either his Scribe, or one of his Sergeants; as if he had not sufficiently offended his Countrey, by what losses he had brought upon it, unless he had likewise abused the Majesty of the Empire with such a scoffe. Whereupon the Polyb. 1.52 whole Senate being juftly incented against him, he was forced to refign up his Office, and was referred to the censure of the People. difficult on the Romans fide; For having fuddenly appealed the Mercenarys, he failed to Italy and in very great compais spoiled the Locrian and Brusian Territorys. But the Romans having found the faith of Hiero King of Syracufe very constant toward them, and his merits great, freely remitted unto him that yearly Tribute they had in the former League compounded for, and made a perpetual band of friendship and fociety with him. In the interim Hamiltan being returned out of Italy landed in the Panormitan Grounds, and pitched his Camp between Panormus and Eryx, in a place by nature very strong, it is called Epeirste, Barclay's Ar- an Hill craggy and full of clifts on all fides, exalting it felf from the circumjacent Region to a

The top of it is not sharp, but continueth a plain of above an hundred furlongs, of a very profitable foil for the feeding of Cattel and bearing of Fruits, being open to the winds from lea, and void of all harmful and venemous creatures. Therein is a certain Hillock which supplieth the place of a Tower, from whence may be viewed all the grounds round about. Near it is a very convenient Haven for those that fail from Drepanns and Lilybaum to Italy, with store of fresh water. There are three wayes of ascending this Mount two from the Land, one from the Sea, but all very difficult and full of obstructions. Here did Hamilear plant his Camp with much confidence having no confederate City near him, and being in the midft of his enemies: But trusting in the strength of the place and his own courage and skill in Marshal affairs, he found the Romans work enough, and very well fetled the Carthaginian affairs, which now began to succeed well at home also. For another Carthaginian General, Hanno, who had a Diodores 14 great emulation of Hamilear's Virtue, to obtain honour, and employ the Army without the Commonwealths coft out of the enemies Country, invaded a port of Lybia about Hesatosppy Polyb. 1.73 Ins, and having obtained the City, fent three thousand Hostages to Carthage; yet they had Dioderus. los, and naving outcome control of the steer prosperity, For L. Butes being his Colleague, a Navy was built at Zonards the charge of private men, which walted the Coast of Africa. For though the Senate had again resolved against sending out of a Navy, yet at the Citizens request they gave leave to have one prepared, upon this condition, That they should safely restore those ships which were built at the publick Charge, referving the prey to themselves; so that a Fleet was set out very confiderable, which brought much terror and damage to the Coasts of Africa and affaulting Kings: Hipps, none of the meanest Cities, they fired the ships of Hipps and many buildings. In their return finding the mouth of the Haven chained up, by art and counfel they devised a way to explicate themselves out of present danger, for failing with all the force they could, when they came near the Chain, all the men retired to the Stern, and so the Fore-Deck being fightened eafily wafted over the Chain; then fuddenly running to the Fore-Decks and depreffing them, the Stern likewife slid over, and they had free liberty of failing, having delivered themselves from After this escape, they fought with the Carthaginian Navy, and prevailed against them. The Roman Confuls divided their forces, L. Metellus besieged Lilybaum, and Num. Fabius, Drepanum. Not far from Drepanum, toward the South, lyeth an Hand, or rather a Rock, which Culverius Sistthe Grecians call Pelias, we Columbaria, which the Conful stormed in the night time, and slew lie antique s.z. the Carthaginian Garrison there. Deepsans, whereby drawing Hamilear from his delign, he kept the lland in possession, and afterward made much advantage of it in besieging Depanum, for he dammed up the sea , and joyned it to the Continent; and breause the Walls of the City were weakest on that side, he there began his assaults. But the encounters between Hamilear, and these, and the Consuls of the following years, Polybius Polib. 1.57 thinks impossible to be described because they were so many, and judgeth it unsit, lest it might give an occasion of the like. For Hamilear, having his Camp at Episite for almost three years together, had almost daily encounters with the Romans, especially when their Camp being before Panermas was scarce five furlongs distant from the enemy. For neither did they refrain from skirmishing, having their Armies so near, Neither did they ever come to the trial of a main battel having many hinderances, especially because their sorces being equal and their Camps alike strong, they were likewise on each side protected by the vicinity of their Camp, to which the party worsted might quickly retire. Hence it came to pass that as in fight some were alwayes flain, to when the battel declined they had a fafe refuge to their Works. But while Zonaras Drepannes was belieged, the Carthaginians Fleet infelted not only the Sicilian but the Italian shores; and Hamilear plundering as far as he could wasted the Italian territories even to Coma.

Many of the Romans Citizens being fallen into the Carthaginians power by these incursions, and the Sicilian fights, the Roman Commanders agreed with the Carthaginians for an exchange Pebb.1.56 of Prisoners, which party received any overplus back, was to give two pound and an half of fil- Liv. 2.3.6 wer for an head, and the Carthaginians receiving more then the Romans paid down the mony ac. It was therefore this year concluded (when the time of affembling the people drew nigh) rather to chuse a Dictator then to recal en ther of the Confuls out of Sicily. Ti. Coruncianus Ti.F. Ti. Suetoniss.

There was hardly any Noble Family in Rome but had had some relation to the Claudians, either by Cognation or Affinity, fo that the wanted not Patrons to defend her, declaring, The Nobility of her boufe, the merits of Appius her father, the frailty of her fex; that it was a thing unheard of for a woman to be called into Judgment: Neither was now the cause so great why a new custome should be begun against Claudia, which had not by any plot or practice offended the Majesty of the people, but only in a few words. On the contrary, the Tribunes alledged, 'What an 'impious and execrable speech she hath vented, ye are not ignorant, O Romans, neither is there any need of Witness, she her felf confessing it; neither indeed can she deny it if she would, because the spoke openly and in publick, not reverencing either the Gods or the multitude of Citizens round about her. When therefore the crime is manifest, why should we doubt of L.29.69 [eq. ff. 'the punishment? Have not the Laws made sufficient Provision? Or while we read the Letter ' of the Law. shall we suffer our minds to be deluded in the Sense of it. 'Tis objected. That it is unufual thus to accuse a woman; if it be so, why it is unufual likewise for a woman thus to offend: Neither hitherto did our Commonwealth ever afford so wicked and impudent a wo-" man. And we wish that there were now no need of making a new Precedent, being desirous that " (offences being avoided) the Law might lie hidden and quiet, rather then be made use of a-"gainst the guilty with a profitable severity. But a City that intends its own establishment must of necessity observe the Laws, which they of all men ought least to pervert who would be effeemed the Princes and Pillars of the Commonwealth; who being skilful in the Laws canont be ignorant, that though in most of them there be no mention expresly made of women yet L.1. ff.de V.S: c in these words, If any One, and the like, both sexes are equally comprehended. What wonder is it then if we believe the Law against Treason to concern both sexes, seeing this very Classdias is an example that both fexes may offend against it? But they Extenuate the businesse, and would have the crime feem small, because it was only in Words. What? this yet was wanting. The did not joyn her endeavours, councils and actions with the Carthaginians;

" the did not raife Troops, arme Slaves, feize on the Capitol, nor actually with her hands effect that wickedness against the City which in words she expressed . Notwithstanding this the Laws. provide not only for the punishment of Deeds but of ill Counfels and defignes also ; if indeed a "mad man or an infant do hurt to any the Law layeth no hold on their actions: yet the mind and 'intentions of others in many causes is made as manifest by Words as by Deeds. She who made fo detellable a wish, what would she have done if it had lain in her power to have brought it. to pass? Unless we despise the Judgment of other men (which we have no reason to do) we shall find that in other places wicked wishes are accounted Crimes. At Athens, which for reputation of Wildom exceedeth all Cities of Greece, there was a man whole office was to provide necessary accommodations for Funerals, condemned, because he wished he might make great gains, which could not be unless a great number of Citizens died: Yet those words might admit of a more favourable Interpretation. But Claudia plainly, and without any 'ambiguity wished Destruction to the Citizens, Overthrow to the whole Army, and Calamity to the whole Commonwealth. Would my Brother were alive again! A naughty wish it is ' if the had made it only for her brothers take; for why thould like be reftored to him by whole "means fo many Citizens loft their lives? who no leffe affronted the Commonwealth by his Arrogancy, then he did afflict it by his Rashness? who being by the votes of all men precon-'demned, avoided not the infamy of his judgment, but by accident escaped the punishment? 'Would you, if you were wife, have this man to live again, whose memory if you could hide in the same Grave with his ashes, it were your duty to do it? For as other Matrons do not vainly glory of the Egregious virtues and merits of their Brethren, fo would he be a shame to * you if any shame or modesty be left in you. But let a Noble Lady be pardoned, though perhaps foolishly the hath defired her brothers company, if the did it out of any pious and charitable confideration. Yea, clearly absolve her, if the cause of her wish be not more abominable then the wish it self foolish and insolent. For why did you wish your brother alive again? 'that you might be comforted with the countenance of a near Kiniman, that his labours might "redound to your profit, his Authority be a protection to you, and his Honour a grace? None of all thefe. And what then ? Even that he might command the Navy again: This, this, wicked

"wretch, was the reason why you desired, as much as in you lay, to raise the Dead, to reduce

Nature to its former habit, and unlock the Cloifters of the Grave that you might find a man by whom we might be deftroyed! This is the Woman, Romans, whose impunity is craved by

"mercy on her, had she had any mercy toward you. But seeing she hath wished the death of flome, the grief of others, that they should be childless and fatherless, nay, the general 'calamity of all: who will be so foolishly tender as to judge her hostile, cruel, inhumane south worthy of any mercy? What great lamentations and complaints were made when the Cenfors upon the last Lustration gave in the number of the Citizens? Though many things these years last past succeeded prosperously, yet good men thought the Commonwealth in no very fafe or good condition by reason the number of the Citizens was so much decreased. But this woman nothing moved at the loss of those who perished, therefore only grieveth because any are remaining. She complaineth of the two great crowd in the City, the witheth him alive by whole fault chiefly the number of Citizens is fo small. But it may be faid. The woman her felf being indeed unworthy your mercy, will ye not yet pardon her crime for her Ancestor's for her Father's fake? Shall we then establish such a Law in our City, That if any man by any means do good to the Commonwealth his posterity shall have the liberty to offend it without punishment? Truly our Fathers were not of this Opinion, when they precipitated M. Manlius from the Rock, whereas the Capitol, the Romans last hope and refuge was, not by his Father or Grand father or any of his Progenitors, but by himself defended from the Gaules. For faving or affilting the Commonwealth there ought no other reward to be required but the conscience of the fact: But Appine, if ever he did good to the Commonwealth received abundant reward, being much inriched and full of honour, in which flate he continued flourishing even to his last old age. Though perhaps it were safer not to make any mention of Appins and the former Claudii, then to put you in mind of those injuries, very high and bold ones, which that Family (from its first Original never well affected to the people) hath committed against you. For what Appins is it they would have you remember, but him who alwayes with an enemies mind, croffing your defigures, chose rather to perish with his Army then be faved by his Colleague, being a Plebeian? who against the will of all the Degrees and Tribes persisted in his Censorship beyond his due time? And now let them reckon sup the merits of the Claudian Family, even from the time of the Decembers, or from the first · Original thereof, they shall find matter whereby to prove this woman like her Ancestors in • pride and contumacy, rather then to make it appear the ought to be pardoned for their fakes. What cause therefore have these, or can any other man alledge why this woman ought to go * unpunished, unless it be feared the City should loose a woman of so good example? of which opinion if ye also are, O Romans, keep her, keep Claudia amongst you; that when our Mastrons kneel at the feet of the gods, supplicating them for the Commonwealth in time of trouble, The may hinder their devout Prayers by her Curles; that while they wish for Salvation for our Armies, she may wish Destruction; while they desire to see the confiders return safe and sound. " fhe may defire to hear they are vanquished, captivated and flain; that while they solicite the gods that few or none may fall in battel, the may repine and accuse Providence if any return home. Keep the woman, that as other Matrons provoke and encourage their children and kinfmen, in emulation of Illustrious men, to Virtue, Courage and Love of their Country, "The may instruct hers by the example of P. Clodius to fight rashly, to run basely, wickedly to destroy the Citizens, and arrogantly to have the Commonwealth it felf in contempt. Let her propound these things unto young Nobles to be resolved upon from their Insancy, to be practised in their Youth: fo let those men be educated to whom you must hereafter commit the charge of your Navies and Armies.

Such speeches being frequently vented Pro and Con, the People assembling in judgement, condemned her, in a fine of five and twenty thousand pound of heavy brass. With this and other Agell.6.10 fines, T. Sempronius the Edile built and dedicated the Temple of Liberty. After this M. Liv. 24.14.16 Fabius M. F. M. N. Buteo and C. Atilius A. F. A. N. Desir ous therefore to Strat..3.10 relieve the Lilybætans from fear and want, being more closely befiged by land, he commandeth part of his Navy to appear in the main sea, as seering their Course to Lilybaum, which while the Romans failed out to Encounter, he flipt himselfe into the Haven, with some ships he had for that purpose placed where they could not be discoverd, and so strengthed and encouraged the befieged with his prefence, and abundance of provisions which he brought. narrower bounds. The Romans (as hath been already declared) had planted a Garrison above the City Eryx upon the Top of the Mountaine, another below at the foot of the Hill. The natural firength and scituation of the place, with the helpe of these guards, seemed sufficient to secure that City from sear of any surprise. But the boldness and Valour of Hamilton. makeing any thing possible, which he listed to undertake, in a very thort time reduced it into his Power. For he in the night time, fetting forward with his forces, and without noise ascending thirty furlongs up the Hill, himself marching in the head of the party, surprised the Romans unawares, and haveing flaine greatest part of those he found in the Towne, he sent the rest to Drepanum. From this time the face of things was very strange, and the warfare very hard and fevere for Hamiltan being now in the midst of two of the Enemies Garrisons, was himself befieged by them below while he belieged those above; both the Romans and the Carthaginians undergoing incredible paynes and danger, did for almost two years next insueing performe the office of most Valiant souldiers. For the Camps being so neare there passed not a day, nay scarce an houre without alarmes and skirmifnes, neither party all this while fainted or yielded. neither did Victory or overthrow part them; but still they continued, equall and unvanquished, designeing in the mean time to prosecute the Warre at Sea al-

And they were much encouraged in their resolution, by reason of their former success, when the Navy was fet forth at the cost of private men: But money was wanting, the Treasury being long ago exhausted with the charge of a continual War. Then did the Noble Roman Spirit featonably relieve the wants of the Common-wealth. fo generate were the Schatours, that in a time or publick danger they foorned to spare their private purses, out of which on the sudden more mony was railed then the building of a Navy required. Those who were richest did every man undertake to build a Quinquereme, fetting it forth compleatly manned and arm'd: others according to their estates joyned two or three together in the same delign, upon this condition, that when the Common-wealth was restored to a better Condition, every man's money should be paid back again. By this meanes two hundred ships of five Oares on a fide were made ready, according to the pattern of that Gally they had taken from Hanniball Rhodius. Great was now the expectation of all men, for being put to their last refuge, they resolved with this Navy of Necessity to hazard the Fortune of the whole War. While these thing were Livie Epitom, in doing, C. Luratius (.F. C. N. Catulus, and A. Posthumius A.F. L. N. Albinus entered the Consulfhip. A. Lusarin the Conful went to the Army before Zenard, Lilybeum, where, while his wound was in cureing, he spent his time in takeing an account of the ships, and Captives, and ordering how they should be dismissed. Thence he went to Orofian Eryx, where he fought Hamilear with good successe, having slain two thousand Cartheginians. The Carthaginians at home understanding what a great Overthrow they had received, Polis, though their spirits were great, yet found that they wanted strength and meanes, to renew and carry on the War. 'Twas added, that these Articles were firmly concluded if the people of Rome would agree thereunto.

But it could by no means be obtained (though the Conful earneftly infifted upon it) that the fouldiers within Eryx should refign up their Armes; Hamilcar protesting, That he would rather sacrifice himself and his country to destruction, then yield to such a disgrace: Nevertheleffe he condescended, That every man at his departure thence should pay eighteen pence,

The Carthaginians, fo they might have peace, refused nothing; Hamilear, before the Zonaras Liv. After this manner was managed and Polyb.1.64 finished the first Carthaginian War, which lasted for four and twenty years with various chances and great losses, but to the greater damage of them who at last proved Victors. Polybins 1.63. For they who have made a particular Account, report about five hundred Carthaginian ships

After this the Government of C. Lutatius the Conful was prorogued, that he might fettle affairs in Sicily: thither likewise was sent his brother one of the new Consuls, 2. Lutatius C.F. C.N. They disarmed all the Sicilians who adhered to Hamilear, as likewise the Gauls who had revolted from him; furthermore the Gauls were commanded to depart out of the Roman Empire, because, besides other offences, when they were in the Garrison on the top of Mount Eryx, they plundered the Temple of Venus. The Sicilian Cities according to their several abilities were forced to pay Tribute and Custom; and it was made a Province, whither a Pretor was sent to command and govern vearly. In the mean time Embassadours came from Carthage to intreat, They might redeem their Eatropius b. 2

Captives, and by Order from the Senate they were all restored without Ransome, as many as were in Publick custody; they who were prisoners to private men were redeemed at a certain rate, the greater part whereof was by command of the Senate paid out of the Treasury. But un-Orofine, 4, 10 lucky accidents at home did much diminish the joy of the Roman people. The River Tibur Austin de Civ. did this year flow higher then ordinary, and filled all the lower parts of the City with large Del. 18 Pools of Water. Many buildings were by the first force thereof washed to the ground, and others, having their foundation rotted (for the Inundation continued many dayes) after the fall of the water, did much decay, After this there happened a greater calamity by Fire, which fuddenly beginning in the night Val Max. 14.4 time, and running through many streets of the City, destroyed an incredible multitude of hou-Orofiss fes and men; and, not content with private harmes, confumed all the buildings in the whole Circumference of the Forum. At length it feized upon the Temple of Vefta; but then L. Val. Max Livie Fpit.19

Cacilins the Chief Prieft, seeing the Holy things and secret Pledges of the Roman Empire to be in danger, behaved himself worthy of his Office, for he leaped into the midst of the fire without any care of himself, so he might but rescue the Holy things which the Virgins had forfaken and left behind them, which accordingly he performed. Himself having his Arme Plinie 7. 43 half burnt and his Eye-fight spoiled, beside the comfort he received from his good act, was eminently rewarded by the people of Rome, who Decreed. That as often as he went to the Senate he should be carried in a Chariot, which from the Foundation of the City was never granted to any man before.

In the mean time Q. Lutarius the Conful, with his brother Catulus and Q. Valerius the Proprator, having setled affairs in Sicily returned home to the City and made each of them their Triumph; C. Lutatius Catulus on the fourth of the Nones of October, and G. Trium. Capitol Valerius on the day before the Nones of the same moneth. There was a memorable strife between these two concerning the Triumph of Valerius; for Lutatius his Triumph being without dispute agreed upon, Q. Valerius contending that his pains and labour were equal in the Victory defired the like honour as he had undergone the like care and danger. Catalas on the other fide alledged. That the leffer authority should not be equalized with the greater in the distribution of honours. The question being hotly argued, Q. Valerius challenged Catulus to stand to arbitration

Whether or no the Carthaginian Navy were not overcome by his conduct? Catulus refuled not to answer him: whereupon Atilius Calatinus was chosen Arbitrator , who asked Valerius whether the Conful's authority or the Pretors ought to have prevailed in case they had differted in Agellius 13,14 their consultation about fighting? and in case their Auguries had been different whether of the two Vaier, Maxim. oneht to have been followed? To which when Valerius answered, That in both cases the Consul's anthority ought to have prevailed above the Preter's; Calatinus not expecting till Catulus foake. passed sentence on his side. But Q. Valerins, though he was cast by the judgment of the Arbitrator, did yet obtain liberty to Triumph, his virtue and courage having been very famous in that War. This year C. Aurelius Corea, and M. Fabius Buteo being Cenfors, made the nine Pighii Annale and thirtieth Lustration. There were numbred two hundred and threescore thousand Citizens; Euleb num. two Tribes being superadded, the one called Velina the other Quirina, the number of Tribes 773 was made up five and twenty, and so continued. Sicily being now wholly subdued, as much Livie Epit 19 as belonged to the Carthaginians, and peace with them concluded, all things feemed not only quiet but very sase and secure; when behold a sudden war, arising from whence it was least feared, did for a few dayes aftonish all Italy both with the terror and fear of an Intestine broil as likewise with wonder at the speedy dispatch and iffue of it.

Taly being now once more at Peace within it felfe, their Publick Pleafures, and Delights did likewife encrease with their Power and security. When the Roman Games were exhibited, C. Claudins A. P. Bothers and Addles of the People did exhibit publick themsout of the Fines railed from Herdlemen who had fed their Cartel on Commons. The Magiltracy of thele Brethren was in another respect very me-Ovid, Varro de morable, in that they caused that Clift (which from them received the name of Publicius) to be made plain and even, for the more commodious passage of Carriages into Mount Aventine, whereas before the Rock in that place was craggie and almost impassable. They likewise built

These things were acted at home, while all things were quiet abroad, onely there was a sufpicion that the Gauls and Ligurians had a defigne for War. That these Provinces therefore were affigued to the Confulls, and war then commenced with the Gauls, is rather a Conjecture, then a true History, there being no antient writer extant which accurately describes those things; Livie, Epit. 10 This one thing is Certain, that a Latine Colonie was planted at Spoletium in Umbria. The next Valei.1.14.8. year alfo 'tis eafier to fay, there was no Peace because the Temple of Janus was not flut, then to declare where or with what successe the war was managed. And the Consulship of 2. Mamilius Q. F. Q. N. and Q. Valerius Q. F. P. N. is hardly known by any other pal-Fasti Capitolini fage then that Ennins the first Elegant Roman Poet was that year borne. But the year after, when Ti. Sempronius Ti. F. C. N. Gracchus and P. Valerius Q. F. P. N. Falso were Confulls, the Gallick wars brake out again, and the Ligurians a new Enemy, were then first invaded by a Roman Army. This Province fell to the lot of T. Sempronius. P. Valerius encountred Livie Epi to Orofius.4.11. the Gaules, at the first with ill success, having lost three thousand five hundred men: But, entring fight again he obtained a fignall Victory, wherein fourteen thousand Gaules were flain, and two thousand taken. But, by reason of the loss susteined in the former battel, the Consul was denied the honor of Triumph, especially seeing his prosperous fight was rather to be attributed to the Fortune of the Common-wealth, then to his wife management of the business. For after the first fight understanding that allitance was comeing to him from Rome, he laid, he had rather perifb with all his Army, then obtain Victory by the helps of others; and in this fury he cast himselse and the Roman Army into the hazard of a battell. T. Gracchus had better and more happy success, for having overthrown the Enemy in a fet battell, he depopulated great part of Liguria; From thence he crossed over into Sardinia and Corfica, and bringing back a vast multitude of Captives, gave occasion to that proverb of Sardi Venales, whereby is fignified any thing that is plentifull, and at an underrate to be fold.

But to consess the truth, the Romans had at this time rather a good opportunity then a just cause of possessing Sardinia and Corsion. The Carthaginians after the Sicilian Peace, were involved in a very troublesome war with their Mercenaries, and reduced even to the utmost ex. Then did they accomplish that which Polyb. 1.33: while they were in Sardina they could not, for at that time they had invited the Romans to the Dominion of that Iland: But being now present either by the importunity of their Entreatys, or by plainly demonstrating what an occasion was offer dof encreasing the Roman Power, they prevailed with them to fail over into Sardinia. The Consuls, having not drawn their forces together, durst not hazard those few they had in the fortune of a Battel, neither could they consent unto the Gaules their demand, they answered therefore, They should fend Embassadors to the Senate, to signific their minds. The Gauls accepted of the condition, and a truce was concluded on for fome days, while the Embaffadours could go and return again. The Ambaffadours at Rome received a denial from the Senate, and greater preparations were made for this War, whereof there was afterward no use, in asmuch as Fortune without the expence of Roman blood put an end to it? While the Embaffadoures returned, the Boians fought a fet Battel with their Transalpine Auxiliaries, upon this Occasion; The Auxiliaries without the knowledge of the Boian people. had marched as far as Ariminum, whence a suspicion arose, that their maine Errand was to posfels that Territory themselves; the Boians therefore were so enraged, that having slain their Kings Ates and Galatus as Traitours, they endeavoured by force to expell these strangers our of their Land, whereupon a Battell was fought with much flaughter, and both fides being thereby much weakned; the Transalpines returned home, the Boians bought their Peace of the Romans with part of their Grounds. The Senate opposed it, and not being able to perswade the Tribune by entreaties or threats, at length gave order to the Magistrates to raise an Army for defence of the Commonwealth . Flaminius could not yet be drawn from his refolution, obstinate against all force, and inexorably by intreaties. His father likewife admonished him, To submit himself to the will of the Sanate, and not be essented an author of section. The Modesty of the Assembly in this rel. After this M. Pemponius M. F. M. N. Maino, and C. Papirius C. F. L. N. Malo being Confulls, had for their Provinces M. Pomponius Sardinia, and C. Papirius Corfice. In both places the Enemies gave back, betaking themselves into woods and craggy Mountains, defending themselves more by the scituation of Places then by Armes. Therefore M. Pomponius feeing it more hard to find the Enemy, then to overcome him, caused hounds to be brought him out of Italy, who by their frent conducted him to the men, whom he furprized like wild beafts in their dens, and kennells. C. Papirius, having overcome the Corficans, purfued them into the mountains, where both his labour and danger was very great, and many of his fouldiers perifhed either by thirft, or by the fudden incursion of the Enemy, till having found water and refreshed his Army, the Corficans fearing the Islue hearkned to the Conful's counsel of submitting them-

They in their March understanding that the Gastles began to firre, entred their Terricorys with the Army. For they being incented and provoked by the Flaminian Law. the Romans feared left being Warlike, and angry men, they should raife any Commotions; it was therefore forbidden by the Magistrares to accommodate any Gaule with Gold or filver; for the Boians, and other Gaules by felling of flaves and other Commodities had gathered a great bank of Money, and a suspicion was raised, that it was for a Roman War. Wherefore being more incensed, 'tis said that they understanding the Consults were designed for Ligaria, did in private meetings conclude, while the Roman Armies were far abroad, to March up to and affault

But, being terrified with the coming of the Confulls, and not prepared to make head against them, they entertained the Romans with all shew of Peace and friendship, and counterfeit Respects. The Consulls likewise being contented they had prevented the War, fained another cause of their coming thither; that shrough the Gallick Territories they might have a more commedient march to Liguria. The last year the Censours renounced the office: This year therefore Q. Fabius Q. F. Q. N. Maximus Verruscosus, and M. Sempronius C. F. M. N. and at Rome, a new war was occasioned with the Illyrians upon their ground. The Illyrians exerciting Pyracy, a cruell and greedy kind of theft, had taken many Italian Merchants coming out of the Haven of Brundusium and had flain some; at the first the Senate hearing this, among other complaints, did not much regard it. But the Pirates boldnesse encreasing by their impunity, and complaints more frequently and earneftly made unto them, they thought fit to fend Embassadours, to demand satisfaction; as also to plead the Issaans cause who had lately committed themselves to the faith of the Romans; for they inhabiting an Iland in the fonian sea . were daily profecuted with all manner of injuries by the Illyrians, from whom they had revol-

That he would take care that the Romans should receive no publick injury from the Illyrians; but that it was not the custom of the Illyrian Kings, to probibit private persons from making what gain they could by sea. The Illyrian Garrison was no sooner surrendred, but the Corcyrians by publick consent submitted themselves to the Romans, seeing no other means lest for their safety, but to be protected against the injury of the Illyrians by the power of so illustrious a City. From Coreses the Consul sailed to Apostonia, where he can L. D. flaments, having wasted over his Army from Brandwisum, which consisted of twenty thousand foot and two thousand horie. The Apolloniatæ greedily entertained the Romans, and committed themselves to their Faith. This being relieved they went to Dyrraebium, which presently became the Romans: The Illyrians who had began the fiege thereof, running away for fear upon the first intelligence of the Conful's coming. With the same hast also the Ardyzi were forced into subjection, and Embassa-dors came from divers Nations of the farthest Illyrium with promise, To obey their commands if they might be admitted into Friendship ; in which number were the Parthini and Afintanes. Apries Demetrius Pharins was a great help and furtherance in these Atchievements, for being carried Illyric, up and down with the Confuls, he extolled the Strength and Integrity of the Romans, accused Zonaras. the Rashnels and Inconstancy of Tenea; and some by reason and counsel, others by his authories he perswaded into a society and confederacy with the Romans. At the beginning of the forms therefore the fent Embaffadors to Rome, excufing what was past as being done by the Command of Agron whole Acts it was necessary for her to maintain. The Romans granted peace, not to her, who had no proper power of administring affairs, neither had deserved any favour at their hands, but to Pinnens the fon of Agron, on thele conditions, That he Bould duely pay what tribute was imposed on him, that he foould quit all Illyrium , some few places excepted. that he hould not fail beyond Liffus with above two Boats, and those unarmed. By this peace Coreyca. Pharus, Ifa, Dyrachium and the Afintanes became wholly the Romans; what else was under Agron his jurisdiction being left to Pinneus. Tenta either for shame or by the command of the Romans left off the Government of the Realm, which Demetrius undertook under the same of Protector. Thus being ended the Illyrian Quarrel, and the Limits of the Roman Empire extended e-

The next year P. Valerius L.F. M.N Flacens, and M. Atilius M.F. M.N. Regulus being Confuls, the number of Pretors was doubled, and they thought fit to create four that they might fend some with command into Sicily and Sardinia. Amongst these M. Valerius was Pretor, of Sardinia and Corfica, C. Flaminius of Sicily. At this time there was very great fear of a Gallick war, for twas reported that the Boians and Infubrians confulted not only one with the other, but with the Transalpine people, and had hired a great strength of Mercenaries of the Galata a people of Gallia. They used therefore not only ordinary remedies against this evil, but such as a severe judge would by no means excuse, but that the love of ones Country makes fome things pardonable which in themselves are horrid. For when besides other prodigies they were terrified with) they found in the Sybills books, That the Gauls and Grecians Bould one day poffeffe the City of Rome; That they might by craft avert the threats of the Prediction, by the advice of the Prieffs, they buried alive two Gauls, of each fex one, and likewife two Grecians a man and a woman, in the Beef-market, that fo they possessing part of the City, might feem to have fulfilled the Prophecy. This was done when M. Valerius M.F. M.R. Me falla and L. Apuftius L.F. C.N. Fullo were Confuls. This year, amongst other no considerable occurrences, was most of it spent in making preparation for the Gallick War. There was raifed a most incredible number both of horse and foot, toward this war all Italy in general joyning with the Romans. Q Fabiar the Historian, who was present at the transaction of thele affairs, reports, There were in arms eight hundred thouland men. That the number of the

Romans and Campanians amounted to the number of two hundred forty eight thouland and two hundred footmen, and fix and twenty thousand and fix hundred horsemen. All the other multi-titude were Italians. The Veneti also and Concenni afforded the Romans the help of twenty thousand men, who by frequent alarms and incursions might compel the freighbouring Boians to the Enemy, because they refused to hearken to Termes of Peace which the Romans propounded. For the Veneti and Cenamant being perswaded to renew friendship with Rome, the Insubrians streb.b.s and Boians perfifted in Holtility ; nevertheless their firength was not great, their Kings not daring to lead out all their armed men : but being forced to leave some at home to defend their Countryes, with the relt (to wit, fifty thousand Foot, and twenty thousand Horse) they began their march through Etruria towards Rome.

In the mean time L. Amilius, Q. F. Cn. N. Papus, & C. Atilius M. F. M.N. had Sardinia and Ariminum, with the adjoyning Gaules for their Provinces. For the Sardinians being Zongraf agerieved at the perpetuall presence of a Prator, with his Virges and signes of Authority, did again move Tumules; but C. The Romans, were hereby deceived, and pursued the horseas if they had fled, and about Fasu-Le were received by the Enemy, fresh and ready prepared, being themselves weary and void of Counsell, as in an occurrence not foreseen by them: Their only course was either by fight to defend themselves, or to sell their bloods at a dear rate ; But the Gaules exceeding in number, befides other advantages, flew of the Romans fix thousand upon the place, and put the rest to flight. The Gaules likewife were informed by the fame fires that the Romans were come, and entred into counsell concerning the present affaires. King Aneros fint advised, that they hauld not encounter the Enemy, nom their fouldiers were laden with rich spailes, but to return home, and lay aside their, plunder, and then, if escasion were given of fighting, to return empty and nimble. Every one approving the counsell, they departed before night taking their journey through Erraria, by the fea fide, L. The Games lesing a troop of Enemies in the higher grounds, conjecturing it was a party of horse, sent round about in the night gime by Aimilian, sent out likewise some of their own horse, with the affillance of some light armed men, to open the passage. But being informed that the other Confull was come, he was forced to array and marthall his foot, with their faces each way toward the Enemy, having in the middle their backs joyned one to the other: For they less C. encounter wherein C. Arilini the Conful was flain, and his head carried to the Gallick Kings: At length the Romans fighting with all might and main, kept the place, and repulfed theene. my. The Horse-fight being thus managed the Foot charged each the other. There was to be seen a very terrible encounter, as for the number & strength of both parties, so for the strange ordering of the Battel; for the Gauls being included between two Roman Armies turned their faces on each fide to battel; it being very doubtful whether this polture were a greater advantage to them in that (having to deal with two enemies) they kept their Rear fecure, and were of necessity compelled to fland to it having no way to flee; or that it were a greater disadvantage to be hemment in by two Consular Armies. But the Romans were partly terrified with the very aspect of the men who food in the front, with sterne countenances and vast bodys; partly encouraged not only with the iweetnesse of praise, but of plunder also, for among the former ranks of the Gaules there was not a man, but gliftred with golden bracelets and arme ftrings. The fight being begun, the light armed men made a great flatighter of the Enemie, especi-

whole body, they stood like so many marks exposed to the Roman darts: and they fell without revenge, being not able to frike the enemie, not to come to pel mel with light armed men. Wherefore growing desperate some runing rashly upon the enemie were killed with darts before they could come to handy-firoks', others by degrees retiring backward disordered their own Battel. The Gæsatæ being thus vanquished by the light-armed men, the compleat armed did on every fide charge the Boians. Infubrians, and Taurileans and flew a great number. nevertheleffe the enemie stood with resolute minds, being in nothing inferriour but in their weapons, for neither did their sheilds defend their bodys, neither did their swords much offend the Romans, for being made only to hacke and hew they had no good poynts; they were likwife made crooked at the first blow, and unfit for a fecond, unless they be straightned againe by Polyb. 2. 30 your foot on the ground. The Romans having already the better, were affored of the victory by the returne of the horse, who, having put the Gallick horse to flight, riding down the Polybius hill made an impression upon the slank of the enemie, so much the more irressible as coming from the higher ground. After this manner Polybius discribeth the Battel of the Gaules in Etruria: from whome others with little reason do diffent. For who can easily believe, that the Gaules were compelled by a tempelt to fly in the night time fearing the anger of the Gods? And that C. Asiim feeting upon theff Hear was flainer. I hat afterward, each party for some dayes Zenaras kept within their defences, L. Aimilius fought happily with them ? neither are they any more to be credited, who relate the Battel as fought, not on the fea Coasts, but, in the Aretine Terris' tories. There is no question made but that fourty thousand Gaules were then slain, little lesse then ten thouland taken, with Concelitanus one of their Kings : the other King Aneros fins who Eutrobine 2 was of greater reputation for power and courage, escaping with a small company, in his flight Polyh cut the throats of all his Kindred and his own alfo. There was great plunder found, which Diederus 24 Polyb. the Conful caused to be restored to those from whom it was at first taken, every master owning Zonaras his own goods. Then marching with his own Army and that of Arilins, through Ligaria in-Polyb. to the Boians Country he gave it in plunder to his fouldiers as a reward of their pains taken, and Diodorus. they in a few dayes being sufficiently laden with spoils, he returned to Rome, to the greater Polyb. joy of all, because the war was formidable. Scarce any mans Triumph was ever so much celebrated with acclamations of the people; being otherwife of it fell very gallant and memorable as for the glory of his noble performances, fo for the number of the Captives and the worth of the spoils. There were many military Ensignes, and abundance of gold Chains and Bracelets, the ornaments of valiant men amongst the Gauls. But all menseyes were cheifly intended upon Britomarus and the other Gallick Princes, whom Aimilius by way of fcoff led Flor. 2.4.2 Zonaras girt and armed into the Capitol, as if thereby he tooke care they should fulfil the yow they Florus find made, Never to unloofe their girdles or Belts, till they had accounted the Capitol. L. Aimilias Fofti Capital. made this Triumph over the Gaules on the third of the Nones of march. This year was made the one and fortieth Luftration by the Cenfors . Q. Glandins Ap. F. C. N. Centho and M. Junius D.F. D. N. Pera. The fear of the Gallick war was over, but the defire of revenge remained, and both the next years Confuls had Gallia for their Province: the Confuls were T. Manlins T F. T. N. Torquatus and Q. Fulvius M.F. Q. N. Flaceus again. The people chear-Fafti. Capitol. fully decreed them Armies and whatfoever accommodation belongeth to the Commencing or Pol b 2.31 profecuting a War. For it was hoped, that after fo great a victory, they might eafily drive Zonaras away the Gauls from about the Po if they minded their bufinels. The Confuls being gone with their Armies prefently terrified the Boians into fubmiffion ; their expedition afterwards was not fo quick by reason of the Peltilence and so many showrs which fell. Others affirm, That these Consult croffed the PO, and in a fet battel overcame the Insubrians that they sem three and twenty thousand and took five theusand. But I rather follow the authority of Polybius in thele alIn place of Livie's Twentieth Book.

In the mean time because the Consuls being in a far Country, and were hindred either by a-Ction, or by showres, to that they could not return to the general Assembly: L. C. acillus L. F. Essi Capir. C.N. Metellus was Created for Dectatour, who confectated for Mafter of the Horse M. Philus were made Confuls. These as I think were the first Romansa, who making an invasion into the Infibrians Countrey, croffed the Po with their Army, where the River Padula falleth into the Po. This boldness cost them much labour and some blood; for in their passes over the River, and Polybius. 2, 23. while they pitched their Campes, the enemie fiercely falling in upon them flew a confiderable Zonaras which the Romans trouble and care upon this News, was mightily encreased by many Pro. digies related, as that in the Picenian Territories, a River ran blood, that in Etraria the skit st.c.4. was feen to burn, that at Ariminum in the night time light appeared, and three Moones were feen at cl.c.4. the fame time; also a Vultur was faid to fit many dayes together in the Forum at Rome. For though Zonaras about the same time Caria was shaken with an Earthquake, and the Rhodian Colossus sell down, Marianui.

these things were not thought to concern the Romans at all: Concerning the other Prodigies, Orofius the Augurs being asked their advice, answered that the Confuts were not rightly chosen, where- Plutare. upon letters were lent after them to recal them back to the City. In the mean time the Confuls Zongraf. having made a Truce, had quitted the Insubrians Countrey, and afterward having raised Auxi. Polybius. liaries in the Countrey of the Cenomanni, had again began to infeft the gounds lying under the Strab. b.5.9. Alpes; whereupon the Insubrians enraged with anger, carried into the field the golden ensignes (out of the Temple of Minerva) which were called Immoveable, because it was not lawful to this them but in the time of Extreem Necessity; and had now met the Romans with Livie. 2263. an Army of fifty thousand men, ready to enter battel. At this very time came the letters from the Senate. C. Flaminius either gueffing at the substance of the letters, or being pre-informed Zonaras by his friends, perswaded his Colleague, not to open them before battel, Being refolved to fight, they consulted about their Mercenary Gaules, lest if they were neglitted, they might have couse to quarrel; and if admitted to the fight, they might have occasion of doing harm. For they feared their inconstancy, especially fighting against Neighbours and Kinimen. At last they thought fit to place them on the other fide of the River, where the bridges being beaten down, they neither could do any harm to the Romans, nor have opportunity to flie, but to trust in their courage: After a sharp dispute the Romans obtained the Victory to the greater praile of the Tribunes then the Confuls. For C.Flaminins had ordered the Battel so near the brink of the River, that there was no space left to receive the Troupes in case they had been forced to Retire; which without doubt would have proved the ruine of the whole Army. But the Tribana, having had experience by former battels, that all the Gallick Va-lour conflicts in the first charge, which is very hor, but short, and if the brunt or it be once borne, there is no more to be feared from them; did divide the spears of the Triaris among the first ranks, that with them they might receive the first onser, and afterward slinging them away, draw their Swords when the fight began; the Gallick Swords were presently blunted, and made crooked at the first stroke upon the spears; and while they were busie in making them ftraight, the Romans advancing with their drawing Rapiers, took from them theuse of their Weapons: For this inconvenience is in the Gallick Swords, that being made only to hack, fome time is required in lifting up the hand, and preparing for the stroaks, which if it be denved, they are of no use : But the Romans thrulting with the point could do their business in a moment and to preffing forward to the bodies of the enemies, they did fecurely thrust them into the face and breaks. Tis reported that nine thousand Gaules were flain, and double the number taken. After the Orofin 4:15. Victory, they spoiled the grounds round about, and gathered much Plunder. Then at length they Philarch. Mar-

thought fit to read the Senates letters, the contents whereof Philus was ready to obey : But C. Flaminius infilted, that this was the envy of some Senators, and not the fault of the Auspices, Zonares whereof there could be no more certain argument, then the Victory they had obtained; he faid also be would not return till either the War was finified, or his Magistracy expired: adding moreover; that be would canfe the Romans to leave off the foolish observation of Auguries, and such other fopperies. Nevertheles P. Furius perfilting in his resolution, the Army of Flaminius. fearing that after his departure they fould not be very fafe in the enemies Country, per fiveded him to tarry for some few dayes; but he did utterly abstain from all actions: Flaminius 2000an taking in the mean time some Castles, as also a City of no small renown among those people The spoiles he gave to his fouldiers; to prepare their minds for his defencein that quarrel he Liv. 21.62. knew would arise between him and the Senate. This City indeed was so moved with indignation, that none went out according to the cultome to meet the Confuls, and not only Fluminius but Plutarch for his fake Philas allo was denyed the honour of Triumph. At length Flaminias by the Zongas. peoples favour entred the City triumphing on the fourth of the Ides of March. Many Liv. 13.14. rich spoiles were to be seen in that Triumph: Great store of Armes, and chains of Gold, out of which Flaminias dedicated a Token of Victory to Japiter in the Capitolium , Floris. 2.4.4 inverting the Gallicks Vow, who had promiled out of the Romans spoiles to dedicate a Chain to Mars. Afterward the other Conful triumphed over the Gaules, and the Ligurians on the fourth Colum. Copies. of the Ides of March. had gathered together a far greater number of Insubrians. The war being thus begun, the Confulls fet out in the beginning of the fpring, and befreged Acerra, a Town between Po and the Alpes. It feeming difficult to drive the Romans from the fiege. Britomarns with ten thousand Galata, resolved to go forth, and waste the Regions about Po. which the Confulls understanding, so divided their Forces, that Cn. Cornelius might with part of the Army profecure the fiege, while Marcellus with two thirds of the Horfe, and a choice company of light armed men, went about to succour and defend their Affociates. Having chosen the lightest and nimblest, not above six hundred, with these and his Horse he march. ed day and night toward the Enemy, whom having overtaken at Classidium, he presently encountred before he could refresh his men, not of his own good will, but forced by the fury of the Gafata, who being superiour in number, and arrogating to themselves the mastery in horsemanship, hearing the Consull had brought but few foot along with him, left off their siege of at length, that he might not be encompassed by the multitude of his Enemies, marched forward to meet them. Their bodyes were now not far afunder, when the Confull intending to begin the Charge, his Horse affrighted with the clamour and shouts of the Gaules, started aside and carried him back. The Confull fearing least this accident being esteemed an ill Omen. should daunt the courage of his men, as his horse wheeled about he adored the Sun, as if he had turned about his Horse for the same purpose; according to the antient custom, men using to turn themselves about when they worshipped the Gods. 'Tis reported, that before the first onset, he vowed to Jupiter Feretrius the fairest of the Enemies Armes ; And presently elpying Britomarus in the head of his Troopes, his armour gliftering with Gold and Silver, and other colours, he judged thef: to be the Armes which he had vowed. The King alfo, having feen the Roman Generall, advanced far before his men, and by voice and gesture challenged him to Combate; CM. Marcellus accepted, and immediately having run him through the breft-plate, wounded him with the speare, and with the force of his bords carriers trimbling him to the ground, retterating his strokes he slew him in the place, whereupon leaping off his horse. and holding the armes in his hands, he lift up his eyes to heaven, faying, Jupiter Feretrius, who beholdest the deeds of Valiant Commanders in battell ! Behold, I the third Roman, as thy felfe canst witness, a Generall having stain a Generall of the Enemies, doe consecrate the Royall sports unto thee: Doe thou Suffer our affaires prosperously to succeed even to the issue of the Wars. Marcellus taking horse again, they entred battell with all might and main, the Romans fighting most couragiously; the Consul's boldness and good Fortune having filled them no less with Valour for the Encounter, then with hopes of Victory. Wherefore neither the Gallick horse nor yet the Foot which came to their reliefe could endure the brunt; fo that a few men, which is rarely feen, carried away the Victory from a numerous Army. The spoils being gathered up. the Confull returned to his Colleague, who having taken Acerra where he found great flore of Corne, being now about Mediolanum, had much adoe to defend himselfe from the Enemy, for bria, they had as it were round belieged him with great multitudes: But Marcellus his approach quickly alterred the Scene. For the Galata being informed of their Kings death, went away, and Mediclanum being by them fortaken, was not able to defend it felfe. So that many of the Insubrian forces being flain, Mediolanum; and after that Comum taken, the other Cities' together with the whole Nation submitted themselves to the Romans, being fined in a summe of money, and part of their grounds, having otherwise good Conditions of Peace. M. Marcellus being returned home, made a most illustrious triumph over the Insubrian Gaules, and the Germans on the Calends of March. This is the first mention of the Germans in the Roman Hiftery, who being hired, came from the Nations beyond the Rhene, under the conduct of Virdomaras their Generall, These and the Gallick Captives, men of vast stature of body, with other rich spoiles were led before the Triumphant Chariot. The Consult followed, with the rarest spectacle, carrying the armes of the flain General to Jupiter Feretrius; after him marched his fouldi-

ers harnefled with glittering Armes, making shouts, and Military Acclamations. In this order' being come to the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, M. Marcellus descending from his Chariot dedicated his Royall spoils to Inpiter, being the third after Romalus and A. Cornelius Coffus, who had done so, and after him no man ever did the like, The people of Rome beheld these Armes with the greater pleafure, in that the Enemies were faid to have vowed the Roman Armes to Vulcan. So great was the Joy of this Victory, that the Romans out of the spoiles, fent a Plus Marcon 1 Golden Cupto Apallo of Delphos , and of the Gallick Armes to their Affociate Cities round

Nevertheless I do not find that these Confuls Triumphed; perhaps because their Victory coft so much Roman blood. In the mean time the new Confuls L. Veturing, and C. Lutaring marched to the Alpes with their Army, but making more use of Treatyes then Armes, they joyned many of those people with their own good liking to the Roman focietie. At this time the Illyrian War was renew'd, by Zonaras Demetring Pharius his fault, against whom many complaints were made, in as much as under pretence of the Roman friendship, he had yexed and afflicted the neighbour Cities according to his pleasure. For being by the Romans invested with power, because he had revolted from Tenta, pleasure. In June 19 of K. Pinnens whose mother Tritens he had married, he behaved him. Appian Illyr. Neither did he any whit fear the Romans, who being involved in a Gallick War, and fearing a Panick one, he thought had neither strength nor Liesure enough to revenge the Polybius 3, 16, Injuries of their affociates. And he promifed himself any favour from Philip Kings of Macedon , whom he had aflifted in the Chemenian War, being General of the Illyrick Auxiliaries: A W ar was therefore decreed against him, and preparations made. In the mean time L. Aimilias and C. Flaminus being Cenfours made the three and fourtieth Luftration, there were numbred Livis 23, 22.2, two hundred and seventy thousand, two hundred and thirty Citizens. A promiseuous multitude Livie Epis. 20 of Libertines being dispersed amongst the Tribes, had hitherto made great confusion; in imitation therefore of 2. Demetriza observing what was done, tooke as good Counsel as in such a dangerous case could be ; for declining the present skirmish , and calling his fouldiers together , Valiant men , faith he, it appeares that our courage is formidable to the enemie, for, betaking themselves to firatagens they declare little truft in their force of armes. They have made use of the night season to ereep into this Hand of which, if I be not deceived in you, they thall poffeffe no more, then what they can cover with their bodys having payed for it with their lives. Only you my Country-men of Phares , and young men of Illyricum , be mindful of your Country , of your honour, and make the Romans know, twas neither their valour nor our cowardize, which gave them occasion once to Triumph at Rome over the Illyrians. It was not Fulvius or Pollhumins with all their Counsel and strength; but Tensa which conquered Illyriam by her fashness and importence of affections. And to omit other things, we are not ignorant, that at that time their victory had not been fo easie, but that Tenta chose to have me rather her enemie then her Protector. But because I firmly trust to you, and the time requires rather deeds then words, I shall say no more. Ye have coutage, ye have weapons, ye see the necessity, which is able to make a coward fight, danger is imminent both to your felves, and your Citie unless by your valour ye repel it. Let us on then and with happy fortune charge these men who are newly crept out of their hiding places: We shall do well enough with those who are landing: if we once overcome thefe, the others will flie to their flips in greater half then now they leave

Having thus for the time encouraged his men, he leads them on to charge those who were possessed of the Hill; and they as diligently ordering themselves sustained his charge, till they, who in the meane time had landed, coming upon his Reare utterly routed his whole body with great flaughter. Some few by flight cleaped to the Town, others by blind paths flipt away. Demetrins who in certaine by-places had boates ready prepared for all adventures, getting aboard one of them fled to Phillip King of Macedon, by whom being entertained, he did by flattery, and Tyrannical advice corrupt the young man's manners, which before were laudable, and

The Illyrian affaires being afterward fettled to his own liking the Conful now at the end of Summer returned to Rome to obtaine his Triumph. In the narration of this War I have likewise chosen to follow Polibius, being not ignorant that others attribute the glory of finishing this War to both the Confuls, who having funmoned Demestries to appeare before them, did, upon default, War with him in the Hand of Ille by the fame arts as I have related and then taking Pharos by Treachery expulsed him out of the Dominions.
